-----:0:----International trade between nations is steadily increasing-getting back toward normal after the wartime upset. It is difficult to tell just how much, on account of the almost constant changes in foreign money values. But, in the first six months this year, the tonnage of exports from seven leading countries showed a gain over the corresponding period of 1923, and in imports five gained while only two dropped. The ploughshares, beaten from swords, will soon be as busy as ever.

The trouble isn't so much that we have too many laws, but that too much time is wasted enforcing the wrong ones. Here's a case. Every community has an ordinance against spitting on sidewalks, in street cars and other public places. Few local regulations are more important, yet how often is the expectorater arrested? If you can think of anything that should be safeguarded more than the public's health, trot it forth. The victim of the most terrible contagious diseases can spit all over the walk without much danger of arrest. But just let him get caught buying a flask of whiskey or violating parking rules.
