A FOREIGN VIEW

While America is battling with prohibition—while Plattsmouth and hundreds of cities throughout the land are having to meet the problem of enforcement—it is interesting to note the words of encouragement that are flung across the seas. Smuggling of liquor was severely condemned at a largely attended meeting in London the other day. The Bishop of London presided, and Sir Austen Chamberlain, the foreign secretary, sent a message indicating his sympathy with the purpose of the gathering.

Prohibition is of course a matter for each nation to settle for itself. America stands out singularly alone in this matter at present. The other nations are not ready for such a ban, and hardly can they understand or appreciate the stand that America has taken. Whether or not in time other countries may follow our lead in another question.

Yet at the meeting in London the other day there was voiced the sentiment that it was unworthy for British ships to attempt to bring liquor into America. The Bishop of London declared it was a great impertinence to try to undo anything that a great sister nation has chosen to decide for its own good.

And the bishop went a little further, declaring that there was no doubt the industrial output of America had increased and its public health improved, and given it as his opinion that the British people had been told a great many manufactured lies about prohibition.

His next sentence sounded as though it might have been spoken by an American, one fully familiar with the problems of prohibition.

"You cannot think anything of those silly little fools who swagger at dances with their brandy flasks. That's merely bravado," he said. "You have to look at the great broad effect upon the whole nation."

The Bishop's advice is very excellent. Some of our own people are prone to get but a narrow, close-up view of the prohibition question to see only the smaller violations here and there, and to form the conclusion that prohibition has failed. As the bishop says, one must look at "the great broad effect upon the whole nation."

Besides being the "root of all evil" money seems to be the subject about which more has been written than any other. Every philosopher since the age of barter has speculated on the institution of money, and it is apparent, the philosophers of the future will find the subject no less diverting, and there are good reasons to believe as long as there are philosophers they will find new phases of the question on which to philosophize.

True to the typically American instinct to couple money with work, John D. Rockefeller says of money: "I determined that, in addition to working for money, I would make money work for me."

In his monumental work, "The Principles of Political Economy," John Stuart Mills came to the conclusion that "money is a commodity and its value is determined, like other commodities, temporarily by demand and supply, permanently and on the average by cost of production."

"Money amassed either serves or rules us," sagely wrote Horace, and just as wisely Bacon wrote, "Money is like nature; of little use unless it be spread."

Dr. Johnson, who made much money but was not prevented by that fact from being often in the want of it, learned from life that "money, in whatever hands, will confer power."

"Money is the root of all evil," is a household adage and suggests this quotation from Fielding: "Money is the fruit of evil as often as the root of it."

George Bernard Shaw has acquired a good sized share of the world's material wealth by creating from his cold and cynical intellect such typically Shavian bits as "Any fool can save money; it takes a wise man to spend it." From the works of his prototype, Samuel Butler, is culled this gem of Solomonic wisdom: "Money is like a reputation for ability."
