Governor Favors State Bridge Law Now in Making

Policy as Outlined in Legislative Message Will Not Retard Road Work Within the State.

From Wednesday's Daily— Governor McMullen discussed his policy for the building of interstate bridges Tuesday, during a recess of the legislature. He said there is no ground for fear the gasoline tax fund will be robbed if his recommendation is followed.

Several members of the legislature have expressed doubts about the advisability of using any of the gasoline road fund for interstate bridges, or even the use of $200,000 from the state general fund as recommended by the governor for state aid bridges, structures built within the state, augmented by county aid.

"We are also interested in connecting the state with other states through east and west highways. Interstate bridges are needed for this purpose. If $150,000 a year is taken from the gasoline tax for interstate bridges, it will probably mean that about $50,000 would be given to any one interstate bridge at a time. The bridges may cost $500,000. The state's $50,000 or some such share would be used in addition to federal aid, a like amount from the adjoining state and other sums raised by a county or local community where the bridge is to be built.

"Our interstate bridges," said A. J. Weaver, president of the Missouri river navigation association, who was with the governor, "should be built high enough to clear barges which are sure to be traversing the Missouri river in two or three years. After the federal government has completed the preliminary opening of the Ohio river and the lower Missouri river it will begin work on clearing out the Missouri from Kansas City to Sioux City. I predict this work will commence in 1928."
