Despite solemn denunciation by nations of the use of poisonous gases in warfare, the next war is likely to be marked by wholesale destruction with chemicals; the laboratories of nearly every large nation are working overtime on engines of death which will make machine guns seem as innocuous as buggy whips.
Voluntary Christmas giving and the spirit accompanying it should not be stifled. Yet indiscriminate giving at Christmas time has its dangers. It is just as desirable that the proper spirit be maintained on the part of the recipient of Christmas giving as it is that the Christmas spirit be in the giver be stimulated. How to maintain this balance in widespread Christmas giving is no light problem. Certainly no legitimate effort toward Christmas giving should be permitted to result in wasted gifts or in harm.

The condition of King George has aroused the solicitude of the whole British empire and the sympathy of the world. The British royal family has kept to the highest traditions of the dynasty. George has been a kindly king, mindful of the humanities in his relation to his people and bearing the high honors conferred on him with dignity and without vainglory. At this time sympathy goes out especially to Queen Mary, the devoted and modest consort of the throne, whose goodness has inspired affection as her character has aroused admiration.

HONORING ORVILLE WRIGHT

The honors paid to Orville Wright are well merited by the surviving brother of the pair that designed and flew the first airplane. It is almost impossible to conceive of our modern life without this air communication, and it is probably that if the Wrights never had gone into this experimenting there would have been airplanes now. This is because of the great development of the internal combustion engine due to the automobile. But the airplane would have been many years delayed if it had not been for the Wrights. They were pioneers of the truest type and scientists of high caliber when they turned their energies to the conquest of the air. They worked together always and, by a sort of unspoken agreement, when one of them took one side of a disputable question, the other brother immediately took the opposite, and between them they threshed out the problem. Together, they made one of the happy, fateful combinations which have been significant in history.

Griffith Brewer, an English expert and authority who knew both the brothers, said that he had endeavored to decide in his own mind which was the more responsible for the airplane. When he was talking to Wilbur he felt sure that Orville had had the greater part in the work; and when he was talking to Orville, he believed that Wilbur had been the directing genius. But he felt sure that, if it had not been for both the brothers working together, with their peculiar temperaments and their high qualities, the airplane would not have been developed in 20 years.

The airplane wings, controls and propeller came from the drawing board of the Wright brothers, ready to fly.
The powerful and reliable gas engine of today might have overcome the absence of scientific knowledge of stresses and strains and surfaces, for, as Lincoln Beachey said, if he were given sufficient power he could fly the kitchen table. The Wright airplane was the product of deep thought and scientific knowledge intelligently applied to the inadequate materials at hand. The Wright brothers studied all the work that had been done before them and found that virtually all the deductions and calculations were in error. They devised and built their plane by pure science, and Orville Wright, whom the nations have this week joined in honoring, stands as one of the foremost masters of scientific development in this great age of scientific progress.

What a beautiful thing is the legal technicality—and how serviceable to the community.
The Cleveland police the other day swooped down on a hotel and arrested a score of men who were just checked in from Chicago. Practically every man had one or two pistols in his pocket. They were, obviously gangsters, convening in the Ohio city for heaven knows what nefarious purpose.
Now Ohio, like other states, has a law making it a felony to carry concealed weapons. One would imagine, therefore, that there previous visitors could be sent to the penitentiary for a few years without further ado.
But they can't. The detective inspector who handled the case says that the courts have held that police cannot legally enter hotel rooms without specific search warrants; accordingly, charges of carrying concealed weapons would not stand up.
The legal technicality is a great boon to the crook, anyway.

HANDY LEGAL TECHNICALITIES

Save money on elections
Under a new law, proposed by Republican Representative Summers of Texas the votes of the electoral college would be sent to Washington by registered mail instead of being carried by one member from each state. The estimated saving to the government would be approximately $15,000 for each election.
There are two other ways of saving expenses, both better than the plan of Mr. Summers, which, after all, would eat up lots of postage. One is to turn the election over to the Literary Digest, as has many times been suggested, and the other is to abolish the electoral college and select presidents, as they should be elected, on the basis of the popular vote.
It is believed that a week of freezing weather would bring an end to most of the current illness. And if it also brought some slippery sidewalks, probably the general practitioners would enjoy setting a few broken arms as a change from the present routine.

We have the finest stock of Christmas and New Year greeting cards we have ever shown. There is still time to have your name printed on them in type of your own choosing at small additional charge.

In view of the tension between California and Arizona over Boulder Dam, and the likelihood that hostilities may break out between these two sovereign states at any moment, we suggest that the demarche calls for pour parlers, intervention by the League of Nations, and an appeal to the Permanent Court of International Justice. If all these measures fail it may be necessary to muzzle the Senators from the two states and apply cloture.
