to provide good pasture until late in the fall. It is used in the temporary pasture rotation at the college of agriculture.
 Farmers who now rely upon temporary pastures may be able to use a rotation similar to that employed on the college of agriculture experiment farm. The land is spring seeded to sweet clover without a nurse crop. This is ready for pasturing about June 29 and furnishes feed until November 1.
 The following spring the sweet clover is again pastured from May 1 to July 20. During July or early August it is plowed up and seeded to fall rye. Rye makes good pasture for livestock until late in the fall and again early in the next spring.
 About May 29 the rye is either plowed or listed and planted to corn, cane, or sudan grass. This system of providing temporary pastures is very satisfactory for farmers having sufficient time to do the summer plowing of the sweet clover sod. Grain farmers may find that threshing conflicts with the summer seed bed preparation.
