EAGLE AND SPARROWS

It was conceivable, of course, that the potential great services to the country of Charles Evans Hughes might be frustrated, that he might be denied opportunity for concrete exemplification and demonstration of these services as chief magistrate of the highest court in the world. But the Senate attack upon him before his confirmation reminds one of a swarm of persistent sparrows uniting in a raid upon an eagle of power and distinction.

The public record of Mr. Hughes is a complete answer to the petty objections urged against him by political enemies of mediocre caliber. What has any one of these, in public or private life, ever accomplished that might be put forward as paralleling the monumental accomplishments of this great American?

If this combination of blemish and bitter baiting had by any chance been successful in preventing senatorial endorsement of the President's appointment of Mr. Hughes the fact would once more illustrate how long and how dangerous has become Senate leadership with respect to the vital interests of the country and the world, and how distressingly weak and impotent has become the once powerful Republican influence and administration effort in the so-called upper house.

Burk, the bandit now being hunted in four states, is another of those remindful of Stephen Leacock's impetuous horseman who rode off rapidly in all directions.

THE DESTINABLE SUBMARINE

That all nations detest and abominate the inhuman submarine, though some of them still cling to it in fear of one another, is proved by the scotching the submersible has come in for at the London conference.

Mr. Stimson says use of the submarine against merchant ships violates alike the laws of war and the dictates of humanity, and he has reminded the conference that the uses made of it in the late war revolted the conscience of the world.

England opposed the submarine at the Washington conference in 1921, but she did not then, as she happily does at this time, enjoy the support of the United States. Mr. Stimson says the United States has changed her mind about it. Her naval strategy at the Washington conference listed the submarine as a defensive necessity. Today she realizes no such necessity, and so joins Great Britain in opposition to the most detestable of all naval weapons.

It goes without saying that the London conference will not abolish the submarine. That despised resort has become the refuge of the underdog. The French, who cannot compete with the great maritime Powers in surface ships, and the Japanese, who cannot match the surface ship strength of either the United States or Great Britain, cling to the submarine. The almost superhuman uses of it made by the Germans have unfortunately lifted it to the status of a balancing power which heartens the weaker maritime nations as much as it dismayes the stronger. The French say frankly that to abandon the submarine would be to deliver the English Channel and the western shores of Europe, as well as the Mediterranean, into the hands of the British Navy. The Japanese are equally frank in saying that without the submarine in home waters their security would not be sufficient under the surface ship disadvantage which they accept in the ratio of 5-5-3.

However, they are all responsive to proposals that the uses made of the submarine should be humanized. The Italians, whose resources in the ship-building category are slender, say they are willing to accept the principle of total abolition of the submarine. France has reminded the conference that she accepted a lower rating in capital ships in the Washington agreement upon the understanding that she was to have carte blanche in all such defensive weapons as the submarine.

So great an ideal as to do away with the submarine is therefore possible only by a better balancing of naval power among the sea-going nations. It is not enough that Great Britain and the United States should arrive at such a balance. All nations have grown up in mutual fear of one another, and until that fear is quieted the weaker nations are going to insist upon the use of weapons repugnant to the greater Powers. This brings the whole problem of war and war's armaments exactly where M. Briand says it must rest if we are to have amity among nations—upon an international society. It is in the absence of such a society that the nations are armed against one another, precisely as it was in the absence of social interdependence among individuals that men themselves once went armed.

HONORS FOR PEACE HEROES

In researches into the nature and possible prevention and cure of the new malady, parrot fever, an attaché of the United States Public Health Service became infected and died. A New York Congressman characterizes him as "a soldier who died in the warfare of science for humanity" and proposes that this great nation provide a special medal of honor for government employes for distinguished work in science.

The details are yet to be worked out. The Congressional Medal is an award almost exclusively for valor in warfares, but the time has come when military distinction has ceased to be the sole and full measure of greatness or devotion to country. Art, science, literature, industry and commerce call for self-sacrifices essential to the culture and prosperity of the nation and it is fitting that such heroes be appropriately honored.

Our bet is that a good many girls will be tempted, to take their skirts back to the dressmaker to have 'em trimmed off after a little experience with the longer ones, just as they took their heads back to the barber's after a little siege of longer locks.
