Dry Survey to Study Drinking for Law Flaw

Aim of Bureau to Curb Consumption, Director Says; Heralds Enforcement Plan

Washington, July 30.—In a sweeping new program of prohibition enforcement, the administration Wednesday projected a continuing national survey of the extent and kind of drinking done under the dry laws.

It was held out as a scientific undertaking, aimed at "truth as accurate as we can discover it." It is to serve both as a measuring stick of enforcement progress and a guide for public opinion, regarding prohibition's effects.

The plan and purpose were laid before the 12 dry administrators of the country, in conference here, by Prohibition Director Amos W. W. Woodcock. He said:

"The aim of our bureau is not the number of people sentenced for violating the law, but a decrease in the consumption of intoxicating liquor in the United States.

Report Daily. The survey is a chief element of the new enforcement plan, shaped since enforcement was transferred from the Treasury in the Department of Justice July 1, with Attorney General Mitchell and Woodcock as its new chiefs.

Will Train Agents. Its other features are: Training schools for dry agents throughout the country, intended to turn out "the best trained body of detectives in the world" and to school them to "use their brains" and shoot only in self-defense.

Uniformity of dry law sentences, to be sought through a national conference of federal judges. Concentration on big bootleg operations, with agents forbidden to "waste their time upon pitiful, picayunish, non-commercial cases.

Two hundred special agents of the federal army to give special attention to "cases where their is collusion with the local authorities." Twenty-four picked men will be schooled for a month in Washington, beginning Sept. 1, to serve as instructors. They will give two weeks' courses to all agents in each subdistrict, instructing in evidence, law and discipline.
