HAWKEYE CANDIDATE SHINES IN EPIGRAM

Yesterday General Matthew A. Tinley of Council Bluffs, Iowa's favorite son for vice-president, left our city, where he has been visiting old army friends after attending the dedication of the Port of Albany. He was a distinguished soldier in the war and first commander of the American Legion in Iowa. In 1920 he was national commander of the Rainbow Veterans' association. "His favorite Christmas presents are receipted bills to patients unable to pay."

He is the champion of organized labor. The Tinley-for-Vice-President club assures us that he "represents, as no other man can, the agricultural west." Mr. Frank Miles, in behalf of the Tinley-for-Vice-President club certifies that General Tinley "is a finished presiding officer; he has all the qualifications essential to the statesman." In short, "Tinley is truly among the noblest of men, a man who in all respects reflects the glory of God and the opportunities America affords. Humbly, but firmly, he has earned the right to extend his services to God and country in this, the prime of his rich life."

Such guarded praise has been bestowed upon hundreds of aspirants. It falls coldly upon experienced ears; but our neighbor the Herald Tribune, with its always cordial interest in men and things democratic, discovered an attractive qualification in General Tinley. To a reporter he said: "America needs to be put together, not torn apart." A delightful companion couldn't help crying out, "How's that for an epigram?" It is an epigram that neither dazzles nor stings but seeks to heal and unite. The democratic party, too, may need a healer and writer. Of General Tinley it may be said that he is neither a prohibitionist nor exhibitionist. He is a centripetalist and an epigrammatist. For all we know, he may equal by his own method, the salient lingo of General Dawes and the pungenencies, without the occasional bitterness and indiscretion, of President Pro Tempore Moses.

Others can conquer. Tinley alone can reconcile. If he continues to shine in the epigrammatic line, he may even win the reluctant sympathies of the American intelligentsia. There could be no more ironical triumph of the middle west.—New York Times.

Every year, America exports more than 50 million pounds of discarded rubber, valued at more than a million dollars. Most of it is cut up into soles for primitive types of shoes worn by natives of many foreign lands.

"TAX BUYING"

Many lazy dollars have begun to work as a result of the newly enacted federal taxes, particularly the excise and miscellaneous levies which will become effective on June 21. Retailers recognized quickly the opportunity to use the taxes as a temporary selling factor. In some instances they are advertising that Mr. Average Consumer should "buy now and avoid the taxes."

Tax dodging in its more flagrant forms is not the practice of the good citizen. Is this avoidance "dodging"? Looking at the economies of taxation, we find that the Government must have a certain amount of money for the year. Normal business for the twelve months is estimated and then taxes are applied which will give the needed money on that amount of business. But if the business due next month is transacted this month, the anticipated taxes—whether or not they have been technically "dodged"—are lost to the Government.

There is no Aladdin's lamp the Treasury can rub to bring them back. They may have to be paid later in the form of higher taxes. But they may not. Statistics are lacking on the extent of increased sales. The taxes thus avoided may have been only sufficient to make a gentle jingle in the national treasure chest. If they amount to enough to cause a serious revenue problem, the buying they represent may be large enough to give business more than a temporary fillip, increasing returns from the income tax.

The amount has been sufficient, certainly, to illustrate anew the effect of a definite stoppage of the downward trend in prices. Mr. Average Consumer knows that most of the new taxes will be passed on him, even though they be collected from the manufacturer or importer. Before the levies were voted by Congress, there was always the prospect that articles not immediately needed could be bought for less within a few days or weeks. Hence, a policy of hand-to-mouth buying accentuated the business recession. With the taxes definitely ahead, the buyer saw that, allowing for a further decline, he would have to wait rather long before making a saving on what could be purchased before June 21.

"Tax buying" gives an idea of the public's probable reaction when it becomes apparent that the bottom of the economic cycle has been reached. For nearly three years the trend has been such as to make Mr. Average Consumer delay. The hurried purchases in advance of prospective taxes reveal that he still possesses many idle dollars. He will put them to work as soon as he becomes convinced that he cannot expect to buy for less.

Former governor Ferguson, in attempting to sell Texas "two governors for the price of one," overlooks or ignores the sharp declines in all commodity prices since 1930, when he made the voters a similar proposition. And it was no bargain, even then.

MR. RADEK OVERSTATES A CASE

Mr. Karl Radek, the well-known Soviet publicist, has written an article in the current Foreign Affairs under the alarmist title of "The War in the Far East" which illustrates an attitude in the Kremlin toward the new situation in the Pacific of which American opinion should take cognizance. Japan is regarded as the Soviet's most troublesome neighbor, and if Moscow could get the United States embroiled first, most of Moscow's problems would then disappear. In fact, it might emerge as the arbiter of events in northeastern Asia, if not farther south in China proper. In view of the Oriental turn which Soviet foreign policy has taken of recent years, this is a matter of prime importance to the Kremlin and to all of its spokesmen.

Read in this light, Mr. Radek's article becomes quite comprehensible. His method of attacking Japanese policy is to show how anti-American it is. According to him, Japanese action in Manchuria is an effort, among other things, to forestall the spread of American economic power in that region. He does not mention that the infinitesimal commercial stake that the United States has acquired in Manchuria has been built up under the wing of the peace and security maintained by Japan. Nor does he say that during the greater number of the last ten years the purchases of American equipment by Japan's South Manchuria Railway have been far more than those by the entire Chinese railway system.

No facts are given, only generalities. The competition which has given the Japanese most alarm, one gathers, is financial. Somewhat mysteriously, Mr. Radek refers to American finance in connection with the Chinese equity in the Chinese Eastern Railway. Undoubtedly the State Department would like more particulars. For it has been a rule in Washington, for reasons of political delicacy, not to approve any American contracts for loans in Manchuria.

Mr. Radek's roving eye also sees the United States as Japan's most serious competitor in China proper. He is the first to see it. To other observers, the "rival" trade is singularly complementary, so much so that while serving as special ambassador to Tokyo during the London Naval Conference, Undersecretary William R. Castle devoted a whole speech to the subject. Japan's special trade with China is concerned with a long miscellaneous line of cheap goods ranging from matches to cotton piece goods, for which it obtains the raw materials from American lumber yards and American cotton plantations. America's chief exports to China comprise such things as tobacco and oil products, which Japan does not deal in.

Few publicists write with more force of argument than Mr. Radek. But he seems to have overstated his case on this occasion. Carried away with his theme, he winds up with the statement, which will make his readers rub their eyes, that by keeping away from China and the Soviet Union apart, the United States is playing "Japan's game!"

AMERICAN MENU WINS

Usually those who dine in public places may be divided into three classes—those who read and speak foreign languages, for whom no menu is a riddle; those who do not understand alien terms, but are unwilling to display their ignorance, with the result that they pretend to ponder over their choices until somebody else has ordered, after which they mumble that they will have "some of the same," and those who frankly ask the waiters to translate the menu.

With so much foreign influence where people dine and the discovery that often what masquerades under a fancy name is common food, it seems important that Gus Waser, a Los Angeles hotel chef, has won a national menu contest with not even a hint of other tongues than English. He proposed: Grapefruit and orange cocktail, cream of tomato soup with crackers, roast chicken with dressing, new peas and mashed potatoes, butter biscuits, lettuce and asparagus tips salad, pumpkin pie and coffee. He might have described the peas as petits pois and the potatoes as pommes de terre, but Gus offers a menu that all may read.

The nation ought to think well of Gus. There is something Wordsworthian in his decision that a potato by the menu's brim a mashed potato is to him, and it is nothing more.—Indianapolis News.
