THE ROOSEVELT PROFESSORS

From the human standpoint, perhaps the most interesting thing about the new administration is the new type of presidential advisers who have come in with Mr. Roosevelt: Omaha wheat yesterday made ever had.

Usually the men closest to the president and of most influence upon finance and affairs. For example, was more prone to listen to the advice of his secretary of treasury, Mr. Mills, than any other. Mr. Harding had his Dougherty. Mr. Wilson his Colonel House, Mr. McKinley his Mark Hanna and Mr. Taft was greatly influenced by Senator Aldrich.

Mr. Roosevelt is the first president whose administration has a distinct university flavor, given it by the small group of professors who are his most intimate counselors and upon whom, in matters of general policy, he seems to rely more than upon anyone else. It is a unique situation, but appears to be working well. Not the least interesting part is that the Rooseveltian professors have had no previous experience in practical politics and are, in fact, as completely non-political as can be imagined. To the average politician this would seem a disqualification for a presidential adviser, and in most cases it would be.
