STOP THE NUDISTS

Sheriff Homer Sylvester and Deputy Sheriff J. E. Lancaster, were called Sunday to the sandpits north of this city where it was reported that several bathers were enjoying themselves "in the raw." The officers found several boys bathing without the necessary bathing suits that polite society requires and admonished the nudists that this attire might be correct at "the old swimmin' hole," but where the crowds were mixed and large numbers present, that suits must be worn to avoid any trouble. The sandpits are used by large numbers from Omaha as well as this city and who object to the undue display by the nudists. The officers remained at the pits for some time but found no further infractions of the rules of polite society.

Brooklyn Bridge in Use for Past Half Century

Born of a Daring Dream, It Took 13 Years to Build, and Was an Engineering Achievement

New York, May 24.—Brooklyn bridge today completed half a century of service since its opening to an awe-struck public on a midnight in 1883.

"Eighth wonder of the world," it was called then. Born of a daring dream to throw a single span 1,600 feet long across the East river, it was thirteen years in the building and cost a total of $25,094,577 ($17,909,412 for actual construction, and $7,185,165 for property).

Brooklyn, which was an independent city in those days—it was not included in the Greater New York consolidation until January 1, 1898—paid two-thirds of the cost.

This first bridging of the East river amazed the whole world, even inspiring a poet to write:

The nuptial knot at last is firmly tied,
A hundred bells ring out a merry chime,
A hundred wires proclaim to every clime—
Manhattan takes fair Brooklyn as its bride.

On this fiftieth birthday, all New York expressed its sentiment for the famous old structure.

Brooklyn bridge's single arch is not the longest now. For instance, there's the greater arch of Kill Van Kull from Staten Island to Bayonne, N. J., and, of course, as an engineering feat it is dwarfed by the magnificent suspension of George Washington bridge across the Hudson—3,500 feet. But the public fondness for the Brooklyn span is such as to deny the charge that New York has no warmth in its heart for things that are old and excellent.

Brooklyn bridge is in the tradition of the city. Perhaps its name has been known to more people of this age than any except the London bridge of "falling down" song fame. Not the least of the contributors to its renown was one, Steve Brodie, a Bowery saloonkeeper, who told the world he had jumped from the bridge on July 23, 1886. Brodie's claim never was completely authenticated or disproved, but it made him a celebrity of a sort and helped to immortalize the bridge in city lore.

Woodin Remains Treasury Chief for the Present

Treasury Secretary Announces That He Has Not Resigned, Nor Has He Been "Fired."

Washington.—Secretary Woodin informed newspapermen after a week end cruise with the president down the Potomac river, that he "intended to continue as head of the treasury." He was asked this as a result of speculation arising from testimony in the senate's inquiry into the affairs of J. P. Morgan & Co., which showed that he and other notables in 1929 were on the favorite subscriber lists of the company for purchase of new stocks at bargain prices. The treasury secretary left no doubt, however, that he would be willing to retire for public life if he thought he might be standing in the way of what he regards as a definite trend for return of good times.

For the present, however, he said simply: "I have not resigned." It also became known that he had not been "fired." There was no doubt also that Woodin, who retired as president of the American Car and Foundry company at the command of the president to take the treasury post, almost on the eve of March 4, had made it clear to his chief that he hoped to be free at some time in the future. It is the conviction of observers here that Mr. Roosevelt is standing firmly by the friend he called upon to help deal with an emergency and that Woodin would go thru the emergency period.

Of course the Morgan hearings were brought up during the week end cruise down the Potomac river. Woodin himself brought up the subject. His friends say he has followed the trend of the investigation and is prepared to make a statement when the hearings are concluded.

Meanwhile, vital treasury policies and legislation came up also for discussion between the president and the secretary. The June 15 quarterly financing is approaching. The government is about to embark upon a 3.3 billion public works program. A bond issue of about 8 billions probably will be floated at that time, an issue expected to run for perhaps five years.

Talking with newspapermen Mr. Woodin was confident of the business future of the nation. "All lines of business and trade are improving," he asserted. "Railroad loadings are increasing. It looks like the real thing. Of course, it has got to be a long climb but the improvement is noticeable all over the country. It is everywhere. Farmers are feeling better. The people are spending money. There is confidence."—State Journal.

CLOSING BANK'S AFFAIRS

From Tuesday's Daily
This morning the First National bank in this city was opened for business, the last function of the receivership in paying off the final dividend to the depositors in the bank. The final dividend is six and three-fourths per cent and represents a total of fifty one and three-quarters per cent that the bank has paid out since it was closed. The bank was closed in December, 1926 and for the past six years the depositors have anxiously waited the day when they might realize all that was possible from the bank assets. The final dividend will release a considerable amount of money in the community to those who were depositors in the bank when it closed its doors.
