When gangsters can no longer depend upon habeas corpus, their game is about up.

A strike in the neckwear industry was settled to the satisfaction of both sides. The controversy ended in a tie.

Bennett Clark says the President is a "very charming man," and it would be interesting to get an unexpurgated version of Huey Long's opinion.

We are reminded that the "Peanut Vendor" song originated in Cuba a few years ago. It is thought, the basic causes of the newest uprising go farther back.

A descriptive article says most of the cane in Cuba is raised on the eastern half of the island. The crop recently harvested in Havana was the metaphorical variety.

One of the universities reports the possibility of attending a school a year, without any effort at self-support, for $234.75. Even one year within that budget would be a pretty liberal education.

In the old days outlaws and bandits were always masked, and now the newspapers do not even mention that crimes were committed by unmasked bandits. But fires still are "of undetermined origin."

American naval aviators are to make a mass flight to Italy next year in return for the visit of General Balbo's squadron, braving the perils of the Atlantic and the prospect of being kissed by Mussolini.

Louisville votes tomorrow on the question of issuance of beer licenses. The Courier, pro-wet, says it is a subject on which everyone is entitled to his own private opinion and urges all to register their desire at the polls.

Sociologists who have been worrying about the declining birth rate are very enthusiastic for the success of the NRA. Evidently they have looked closely at the blue eagle and have discerned some family resemblance to the stork.

In Sir Thomas More's Utopia, the 6-hour work day was an important feature. This, of course, contributed greatly to coining the opprobrious term "Utopian," which has been such a handy refuge for conservatives for more than 400 years.

Two partners in the Citrus Products Company of Chicago are in a lawsuit, the evidence being that one of the partners was discovered kissing the wife of the other partner. This has led to a somewhat acid condition between the citrus partners.

Senator Couzens says the Detroit banks whitewashed their financial condition before the bank holiday by kiting checks on each other. Everything went along all right, apparently, until some misguided person who didn't know the rules tried to cash one of the checks.

The Hitler government has forbidden the practice of vivisection in Germany. The state's protection under this order, however, extends only to certain nonparasitic small animals, we understand, and does not indicate any softening of the Nazi attitude toward political enemies.

Unless the NRA operates miraculously, some of the long winter evenings next winter are going to be just as long as they were last year. And will jigsaw puzzles come back again to save the situation? Jigsawing, mixed with prohibition repeal, presents remarkable possibilities.

A young American college graduate has been arrested in Tokio on a charge of pacifism. He has been in Japan only a short time, probably having read the Japanese state department's explanation of its strictly defensive military policies in Manchuria last spring, and jumped to the conclusion that Japan is the pacifists' paradise.

AMERICA IS GROWING HOUSING CONSCIOUS

It is more than half a century since George Peabody, American-born merchant, erected the model dwellings which sought to conquer the London slums. Not very long after that, the slums of American cities were put on the defensive, mainly through the vigorous campaigning of the late Jacob A. Riis.

Since that time, many farsighted men and women have carried on the crusade against housing conditions which protect and invite crime, vice and delinquency. The results achieved so far are encouraging, but not extensive. In this country, they have been dependent upon philanthropic interest. There has been little or no large-scale attack.

The slums of Cleveland and other large cities have spread. They have infected our familiar blighted areas, creating a rotten core at the heart of the metropolis and every year extending their withering influence a little farther out.

Today the picture is changing. There is a new opportunity to translate plans into action, to begin an attack upon bad housing which will bring substantial results. Builders, architects and social workers at last have the feeling that they are getting somewhere. Federal funds are made available under the national recovery legislation which will permit large-scale operations. Building costs are lower than they have been for years. Real estate values have had the water squeezed out of them. Now is the time to link federal financing, unemployed labor and the excellent plans which have long been under discussion.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

ENDING BENEFITS OF FORESTRY CORPS

At some distant day when historians are coldly appraising the Roosevelt recovery program it is not unlikely that they will find in the reforestation project one of the most enduring and important of the measures identified with the new deal. Its importance to them will be clear not because it has given employment to 300 thousand young men, thus relieving by so much the unemployment crisis, but because it will stand as the first effective move of this country to preserve its forests.

This is not to depreciate the value of the movement in lessening unemployment, not to discount the wholesomeness of removing 300 thousand young men from the demoralizing influence of idleness in the cities of the country to healthful and useful outdoor activity. We believe with Mr. Robert Pechner, director of emergency conservation work, that the reforestation service will pay dividends in health and spirit as well as in a material way. This is evident to those who have seen the physical change that has come to the men in the forest camps during the few weeks they have been at work. And with the physical change has come an increased capacity for the pleasures of living. According to all reports, the boys are in fine fettle. They are having, in the language of youth, a swell time.

But, as important as these results are to the immediate moment, the enduring element in the reforestation project lies in its relationship to national conservation. Long ago other civilized countries have realized the importance of preventing the depletion of their forests. They are essential to industry. They bear an important relation to water supply and flood control. It is likely that they affect weather conditions. Certainly they have aesthetic value. Europe knows this and for generations has exercised strict supervision of forests. No such devastation of woodlands has been practiced in this country would be possible in France or Germany.

Once having become forest conscious, as it were, we can't believe that this country will regard the reforestation project as merely a momentary expedient to lessen unemployment. The new deal will have been worth much if from it develops an intelligent and continuing forest conservation policy.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

SUCCESS OR FAILURE NOW UP TO PUBLIC

The time has come in the recovery drive when success or failure is up to us.

The strategy has been planned, the machinery set in motion. We must help ourselves now, if we are to be helped at all. The way we spend our money now—today and tomorrow and for the next few weeks—will cast the balance between employment, decent wages and recovery, or unemployment, starvation and chaos.

In spite of America's long training in self-government, it is something hard to realize that we as individuals can be of such supreme importance in this economic crisis. We have become accustomed to feeling that we are helpless puppets where economic matters were concerned—that mysterious force beyond our control determined whether or not we should eat.

Today this is not true. Our fate is in our own hands. A people that despises the dole, that glories in working its own way out of its own difficulties, has its supreme opportunity to demonstrate the strength of this determination. The woman with a shabby dress and worn heels and a market basket occupies a position of unique importance in the economic world that few "important" people have had in the past.

Recovery Administrator Johnson says:

"The public must buy now. It must buy the blue eagle, and it must buy to the full of its reasonable and prudent needs. To support increased wages there must be increased business. To get increased business there must be increased buying. Increased wages depend upon increased buying. We can't have one without the other, and that is as certain as that two and two make four.

"The point about buying under the blue eagle is just as certain and just as simple. Increased wages come from blue eagle employers only. Blue eagle employers cannot continue increased wages if public patronage goes to their competitors. Failure to support the blue eagle is failure to support increased wages and re-employment."

The blue eagle cannot lead a dumb, indifferent or greedy people to the promised land. It cannot save by force those who don't want to be saved.

But the blue eagle can show the way to a people with enough intelligence and will to march behind it.—New York World-Telegram.

FINE FEDERAL WORK IN BAILEY CAPTURE

When federal men captured the notorious Harvey Bailey at a farmhouse near Paradise, Tex., they killed three birds with one stone, for their quarry had been involved in three major depredations of the last few months. He was one of the leaders in the Decoration day break at the Kansas state prison, when 11 convicts escaped, and for several weeks thereafter spread a reign of terror over the countryside. He is identified as the leader of the murderous band that killed four officers, including a federal man, and their prisoner at the Kansas City union station June 17. By the evidence of marked money and fingerprints, he was involved in the recent kidnaping of Charles F. Urschel, Oklahoma City oil man, for whose release 200 thousand dollars was paid. In addition Bailey is wanted in 12 states for bank robberies and holdups.

High tribute should be paid the federal officers who ran down this desperado and captured him, with several of his followers, without bloodshed. Government authority again has proved its ability to get its man. Unhindered by state lines or jurisdictional conflicts, the federal men's fine detective work had free play. Having confidence of the Urschel family, the officers got complete and quick information that led to a speedy solution of the case. Such achievements strike terror into the heart of the underworld, and create confidence in the minds of a harassed public. It is fortunate that the states now have the able co-operation of federal authorities in the nationwide war on crime.

We agree heartily with Assistant Attorney General William Stanley, who says: "It is ridiculous to think that the gangster and racketeer, a negligible proportion compared with the great body of American people, is superior to the mind, ingenuity and resources of the nation." In the federal forces, the nation's mind, ingenuity and resources are mobilized. The local authorities have intimate knowledge of a narrow region; the federal authorities have a widespread organization. Co-operation of the two creates an efficient army in the war to wipe out crime.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

week end, coming to attend the Stander family reunion which was held at Louisville. On arriving here, they supposed that on account of the heavy rain there would be no reunion at Louisville, so a reunion of the nearer members of the Stander family was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Selker, at Elmwood, with some thirty-five there. Later they learned that the reunion planned to be held at the old Stander home at Louisville was held in spite of the weather, the location being changed to one of the churches in Louisville, with an attendance numbering over a hundred.

On returning to their home at York, they left two of their children, a son and daughter, for a week's visit at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Rauth.

THE GRADE CROSSING SHOULD BE ELIMINATED

In his letter to Secretary Ickes Joseph B. Eastman, federal co-ordinator of transportation, criticized the placing of rail-highway grade separations last on the list of necessary public works.

Eastman's point at least warrants some consideration.

In the first place, as he shows, the number of deaths annually among railroad passengers is trivial beside the number of auto passengers killed at grade crossings.

In the second place, the lack of separation is becoming an important traffic problem. In Des Moines for instance, there are a number of switching tracks across the city's busiest thoroughfare, cutting off traffic between the downtown district and both the state capitol and the fairgrounds many times a day.

In the third place, we are thinking more and more in terms of super-trains that will be able to compete with other modern forms of rapid transportation. Streamlined coaches that will eventually streak across the prairies are not merely envisioned, but actually in service on some eastern lines. As the speed of trains increases, the peril to the lives of both motorists and rail passengers is increased so long as grade crossings are common.

It is heartening to Iowans that three grade separations are to be a part of the new routing of transcontinental highway No. 6 through Des Moines, not only because of this one project's value but because it hints at the foresight of the Iowa highway commission and the willingness of the bureau of public roads to co-operate in the elimination of grade crossings.

Possibly Co-ordinator Eastman is unduly exercised about the priority of other projects than underpasses and overpasses. The advisability of avoiding large expenditure on crossings along rail lines subject to abandonment is of course obvious. But as a national "institution" the grade crossing has eventually got to go. There appears no valid reason for not expediting the disappearance now.—Des Moines Register.

Now that we have shorter working hours, will the government try to abolish the ninth inning baseball?

It is fitting that ex-President Hoover should decline to go to Detroit to rehearse what he remembers of the Michigan bank situation in the closing hours of his administration. Mr. Hoover's testimony would naturally be thoughtful and restrained in tone, which is precisely what Detroit hasn't been accustomed to in popular discussion of its financial affairs in recent months. It's just as well Mr. Hoover has decided to stay away. He wouldn't fit in, in Detroit.
