MAY

The springtime of life for the valiant youth. As depicts the buds and blossoms of truth. And stores them away in a loving breast. Then drinks the dew that sparkles on the nearest crest. The robins and wrens don't forget the month of May. As they are gathering food most of the day. To feed their birdies in their downy nest. When darkness comes they all go to rest. The roses and peonies don't forget the time. To express their beauty and drink in the sublime. And the grass and the trees spread a carpet of green. To shield the lovers who are afraid to be seen. As the Romans counted, May, the third from March. Age then was wanting the brightness of the larch. Until the balmy air of May could revive. The withered branches, dusty and keep them alive. May youth, from the crucible never grows old. It extracts the dross and refines the pure gold. Of character trained in the furnace of life. Brings joy to our commonwealth and settles all strife. December and May will never unwind. The snarls that tangle and securely bind. The cords of life into a gordian knot. And leave them helpless upon the spot. When the ozaniferous breeze comes floating through the air. And arouses the sluggard from his drowsland fair. The inspiration seizes the youth-fu indigent at rest. And transforms him into a new life full of zest. —J. R. T.

Scene of the Tragic Crash

Only a singed spot in the Catskill Mountain Wilderness marks the place where the airliner crashed and burned with a loss of seven lives. This photograph from the air indicates how little there was for the searchers to see in seeking the lost aircraft. This spot was discovered through glasses from a distance of several miles seems almost a miracle.
