Modify Feeder Pig Purchase Rulings.
Corn hog contract signers may now buy any number of feeder pigs from any one who has pigs to sell, according to a statement received from Washington the first of this week.

In order to keep records of compliance straight in the county office of the corn hog association, the federal adjustment administration will require that each purchaser of feeder pigs either keep them separate from other hogs on the farm or ear mark them so they can be readily identified. The purchaser is also to fill out a blank and file it with the county corn hog association within a week after the pigs are bought.

Blanks for this purpose are not yet available. Farmers who buy pigs within the next few days should keep the following information so they can fill out the blank when it comes: Date of purchase, name and address of seller, number and average weight of pigs, and kind of identification mark used.

The modification of the previous rulings about feeder pigs applies to the four months, August, September, October, and November. Lack of feed in drouth areas and the necessity of moving feeder pigs across county and state lines made it advisable to open up the buying and selling of these pigs for contract signers.

To date no further statement has been made by the federal corn hog administration regarding excess pigs. The state administration at Lincoln has submitted three proposals to the men at Washington but received no reply. All of the proposals were based upon the emergency drouth situation existing over much of the state.

Check Corn Hog Compliance.

The Nebraska corn hog compliance program started over the entire state Tuesday and Wednesday of this week in nine district conferences of corn hog allotment committees, agricultural agents and men chosen to take charge of the compliance program in each county.

A county school will be held first to train men to figure corn acreage, count hogs, and fill out the compliance blank on each farm under contract. Local men, most of them farm boys or men with contracts, have applied for the work and will be selected by an examination at the close of the school. They will be known as supervisors.

When the supervisor has filled out the blank and proved compliance with the contract, and the allotment committee has approved the statement, the proper blanks will go to Washington to be reviewed by representatives of the Secretary of Agriculture and the United States Treasury. When the blank for a contract is accepted in Washington, the farmer will get his last payment on corn and his second payment on hogs. This will amount to about 14 cents on corn and 1 per head on hogs. He will still have his last installment of hog payment coming after he proves he has complied with the hog part of the contract on December 1.

Farmers with contracts are being sent a letter asking them to be ready to help the supervisors on the corn acreage and hog count and in filling out the blanks. As the supervisors go about their work, they will notify the farmers a day or two in advance regarding the exact day and hour of their visit.

Those entitled to these concessions should get a statement from their county extension agent and present the same at the student activity building.

It is beginning to look as if this country is suffering from the legislative indigestion. There is a distinct danger that any abuse of authority, so easily handed out by congress will do much harm instead of good.

In abuse of authority, we refer to the growing policy of congress to rush bills through without proper consideration. Congress is supposed to give ample time and thought to every law they pass and not rush anything through.

Now the average member of congress may be an irreproachable family man, a devout worshiper at church, an exemplary taxpayer, and he may think it is not necessary to wade through page after page of printed matter to know how he is to vote for the best interests of the people. But the fact is that in many instances he just votes and doesn't know what it is all about until it is too late.

The economy bill was a case in point. The bill was rushed through as if it were vital to the country's existence and after it had passed, congress found out its injustices and their mistakes and turned around and corrected a few of the mistakes. It is hope that the next congress will repeat the bill.

What the country spent on its disabled veterans was only a drop in the bucket to what it now spends for other things.
