Wallace in Tribute to the Farm Women

Their Contribution Is Most Important to Industry, Says Secretary of Agriculture.

Washington.—“In greeting the several thousand country women assembled here from 18 foreign nations and nearly every state of the United States, I do so with the thought in my mind that women make a more important contribution to farming than they do to any other single industry,” said Secretary of Agriculture Wallace.

“The duties of the farm mother and housewife are multitudinous beyond enumeration. Science, electricity and city conveniences have lightened the burdens of millions of city women but the great majority of farm women over the entire world still face the problem of operating a household with relatively primitive facilities. Fortunately during the past 20 years there have been enormous changes and there are prospects that there will be even greater changes during the next 20 years. Rural electrification is easing the burden of the farm wife more and more over the entire world. Good roads are widening her contacts and her interests. Knowledge of modern nutrition enables her to keep her children in better health.

Yes, the farm woman is on the move. I rejoice in it, for it means the betterment of all mankind. From the farm woman comes the breath of life to our cities, now that our cities over the entire western world are no longer producing enough children to maintain themselves.

If a great majority of them are to be condemned to unremitting drudgery, denied household conveniences common to most city homes, denied the opportunity for leisure and recreation and cultural activities—if this is to be the program for the rural women of the world, then we cannot expect either the material or the spiritual progress we wish to see in the coming generations. If, on the other hand, not merely 30 to 40 percent but 80 to 90 percent of our farm women can have the household conveniences and the cultural opportunities they ought to have, along with improvement in the general economic position of agriculture, then the future both for farm women and for our civilization is immeasurably brighter. Then physical handicaps, at least, need not prevent the farm mother from performing her true function of inspiring the members of her family to appreciate the beauty of day by day living and the joy of a future rich in possibilities.

“We hope for much from this international conference of countrywomen.”
