Woodman Spare That Tree.

From the poem "Woodman Spare That Tree," has been sung many a song which seems to survive the age for much interest is now centered on the growing of more and more trees every day.

Sixty-three years ago, that was in 1863, during the Civil war, Amos Tefft, father of the late Orlando Tefft, grandfather of C. E. Tefft of Weeping Water and great grandfather of Carl Tefft and great grandfather of the children of the latter, who was walking about the farm, cut a cottonwood stick which he used for a cane, and when he was near where the Missouri Pacific station now stands, he having completed his stroll, stuck the cane into the ground which seemed to be a very congenial place, and it grew. That was a long time ago, and with each succeeding year it became larger and was one of the trees of the Tefft farm. With the years also came the Missouri Pacific railway and with it the Western Union Telegraph company and with the getting larger and older limbs would be broken off, and the lightning would strike the tree, hurling large limbs on the lines of the company, causing much trouble. So to obviate this trouble they secured permission of the owners of the land to cut the tree down which they did and found the girth of the stump to be seventeen feet and an inch.

The people of Avoca had grown to look upon this tree as a portion of the landscape and when the tree was cut down they resented the act and were loud in their protests. But the tree is gone and a familiar landscape removed from the vicinity.
