Laughing Around the World With IRVIN S. COBB

The Unforgivable Sin

By IRVIN S. COBB

A YEAR or two before his death, Booker T. Washington made an address in a small town in Georgia. He looked like a bronze lion and he spoke, as he always did, as one inspired. When he had finished, an old Confederate soldier, white haired and white moustached, pushed forward to the platform, his old face aglow with enthusiasm and approval for what the orator had said.

"Professor Washington," he declared, "I want to do now what I never thought I'd be doing-I want to clasp your hand and pledge you my support for the great work you are doing. And furthermore, I want to tell you this-I want to tell you that that was the best speech I ever heard in my life and that you are the greatest man in this

"I'm afraid you done me too much honor," said Washington. "Wouldn't you regard Col. Roosevelt as the greatest man we have?"
"Huh!" exploded the Southerner. "I've had no use for him since that time when he invited you to eat a meal with him at the White
