LOCOMOTIVE ON TEST RUN

From Monday's Daily—
A number of persons were at the station at 9:10 this morning to see the streamline locomotive, Aeolus, make its test run with No. 6 from Denver to Chicago. This is the first of the streamline steam locomotives to be used. It is the start of a program to ascertain the roles of steam and Diesel-electric power in American railroading in the future. The name "Aeolus," given to this engine, means "keeper of the winds."

The locomotive is of the 4-6-4 type, carries 250 lbs. steam pressure, and uses coal for fuel. A streamlined shell of stainless steel almost completely encases both locomotive and tender. The locomotive is said to be practically vibrationless at 100 miles an hour.

The new engine is capable of speeds well over 100 miles an hour and cruising speeds of 90 to 100 miles an hour can be continued almost endlessly. It is expected to be able to maintain the Zephyr's 16-hour schedule over the 1,034 miles between Chicago and Denver.
