Reminiscences of the Fair.

No coupons required! Published expressly for us! Issued weekly! Two hundred and fifty six superb Exposition views, the cream of the collection secured by the United States government photographer for preservation in the archives at Washington.

After weeks of unceasing endeavor, correspondence and trouble we have at last made a contract with one of America's famous publishing houses, whereby we have secured the KING of all WORLD'S FAIR publications, which we now offer exclusively to our patrons and friends.

Nothing compares with these superb Art Portfolios of World's Fair views, covering every Exposition feature from the Peristyle to the Plaisance.

Each number contains 16 official government photographs. The series will be issued weekly. For every purchase of $1, and 10 cents additional, you will be given one of these beautiful art souvenirs, and thus continue until you have secured the entire series of 16 numbers.

We wish it distinctly understood that in connection with this enterprise we guarantee the very best quality of goods in every department, at lowest living prices. Come and be convinced.

Reminiscences will be issued every Wednesday, and you can secure them as rapidly as you desire. We feel assured that you will be more than pleased with the Portfolios, and will be as anxious to make the collection of the entire 16 parts as we are to enable you to do so.

QUIT senatorial courtesy and draw the line. If a man will not vote for a democratic measure, he is not a democrat. Let him resign.

THE president has to change collars three times a day. We could better account for his heated condition if more republicans were fired out.

THE figures giving $800,000 as the annual income of Senator Brice must be revised. They were made before the senator took his fly in sugar stocks.

WHY is it called the sub-committee on finance? Most of the senators composing it can teach "finance" to any of the other senators on or off the main committee.

WHY don't Congressman Morse and Joseph Cook make an effort to have God more generally recognized in Massachusetts before they insist on his recognition in the constitution?

CAPITAL CORRESPONDENCE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 14, 1894.

Washington has its characters which have become national in their fame, even though they were not in congress. Among these notables none are more justly celebrated than Rev. Dr. Milburn, the blind preacher, who is chaplain of the senate, and for many sessions before this, chaplain of the house of representatives. In person Dr. Milburn is a tall man of large frame, a long, oval face, strong features, a full, long beard and flowing locks of gray. He is a man of fine presence and impressive mien. He enters the senate precisely at the hour of 12 m., led by one of the pages, ascends the steps to the vice-president's dias and opens the session with a prayer as impressive and earnest as one ever listened to from a backwoods Methodist evangelist. His strong bass voice is clear and resonant, and is easily heard throughout the senate chamber and its surrounding galleries. Fifty-odd years ago Dr. Milburn began preaching in Baltimore, and although for long years he has been blind, he never gave up his life work. His attainments are remarkable, and none of them are more notable than his wonderful memory. On Sunday last he filled the pulpit at the Metropolitan M. E. church, and I listened to his marvelous discourse with wrapt attention. The chaplain not only gave out the hymns, but recited the lines just as though he were reading them from the hymn book. He also led in a responsive reading, reciting alternate verses of the ninety-first psalm, and for first and second lessons recited, without hesitation, portions of the seventh chapter of Matthew and the second chapter of first John. The sermon which followed was as remarkable as any pulpit effort I have listened to in many years. It was not only fervent and eloquent, but was methodical and logical. Although upwards of seventy years of age, there is every prospect of his having years of usefulness still before him.

In my last letter I predicted that the seigniorage coinage bill would come to a vote in the senate the next day, but it was not to be so. The senate prides itself on being a deliberative body, and although the friends of the measure had the whip-hand, they preferred to permit the opposition to have their say before they forced a vote, so they agreed to let discussion run without stint until two o'clock today, when a vote was to be taken on Senator Allison's motion to reconsider the vote on the third reading of the bill, and after that was taken to discuss it under the five-minute rule until two o'clock tomorrow, when a vote will be taken and the bill passed. Several test votes have been taken in the meantime, however, and there is no doubt of the final outcome. The vote by which the Allison motion was defeated stood forty-six to twenty-three—exactly two to one. It was notable that Senators Vilas, Palmer and Brice—democrats—voted with the republicans for the resolution.

I notice that the Washington correspondents of both the Bee and Lincoln Journal delight in putting Senator Allen's position down as doubtful on the Wilson bill. I am prepared to say that there isn't a protectionist hair in Senator Allen's head, and that the only contingency that could find him among the bill's opponents is that before it comes to a vote in the senate the bill may be despoiled of its tariff reform features by the trafficking democrats of the Brice, Murphy, Smith variety, whose chief stock in trade is barter, and who are utterly wanting in the democratic principle—and I'm not sure but I might classify Senator Hill with this outfit. Of that we shall see further along.

The house has had under discussion for more than a week the several appropriation bills, and has passed the pension and the district of Columbia bills, while the sundry civil is now on the boards. All of these bills show considerable of a reduction in amounts from those of last year, and in the aggregate will make a saving of some $20,000,000. In the discussions and votes there is one remarkable fact running through them—the republicans uniformly stand for larger expenditures than the democrats, and this fact seems to be generic and all-pervading. It is not a new thing, but for many years has distinguished the two parties in both the house and the senate. In the years when the republicans were in power it was charged that the disposition to cut down appropriations was simply evidence that the democrats wanted to embarrass or cripple the administration by creating deficiencies; but this position does not answer for the present attitude of the two parties—it only shows conclusively that the democrats were consistent then, and are today standing for economic government in every possible direction, and also that the republicans, by force of habit, it is presumed, are for extravagance, just as they were when they were in power and had the control of the nation's purse-strings.

A Visit to Mount Vernon.

It has been said, "that a trip to the national capital is but half made, unless a trip to Mount Vernon is included."

The writer is willing to vouch for the truth of this statement.

When we western people return to our homes at the east, we do not do so for the purpose of seeing the new occupants, but the old home as it was in the days of our childhood. Thus it is with a visit to the nation's capital. Here can be seen the bustle of officers and employes going about the nation's business. But one would scarcely think that this is the same old government that was founded by George Washington and his compeers. It has about the same appearance comparatively as the old home—stead of our childhood with new occupants.

But let us go to Mount Vernon, the old home of the father of our country; see it as it was when he lived there.

To reach this venerable spot in the most pleasing manner, and especially for those who enjoy boating, is to go aboard a steamer at the foot of 7th street, Washington, D. C., which daily leaves the wharf at 10 o'clock a. m. We gently float down the placid waters of the Potomac, passing the ancient, historical city of Alexandria on the right, old Fort Washington on the left, and after about one hour and fifteen minutes ride, we are landed at the foot of Mount Vernon. It might be well to observe why this is called Mount Vernon. It is fair to presume that the name Vernon was given in honor of Admiral Vernon, who was in command of the attack on Carthage in 1741, with whom Lawrence Washington, brother of General Washington, served; and the prefix "Mount" could not wisely have been supplemented by any other word, unless it would have been "Mound."

After leaving the wharf, we are led up to the buildings by a plain board walk laid upon a gravel, first passing the new tomb, where can be seen through the iron grating the white marble caskets containing the remains of the General and Martha Washington; and in the back part of the tomb, but not in view of the public, are the remains of about forty members of the Washington family. On the outside, and in front of the tomb are erected two white marble monuments to the memory of the general; one by the widow and the other by the government. Passing up the walk we come to the old buildings on the left, first the smoke-house, then the laundry, and third in line, the carpenter shop where it is supposed George kept his little hatchet. Then on the right at the side of the family kitchen, is the old covered well with buckets and chain (a real Nebraska well) from which I took a cooling draught. Passing through the kitchen where a very robust looking maiden, who was neither a blonde, brunette, nor colored by Nebraska winds, was keeping everything in repair as her ancestors undoubtedly did many years ago. This kitchen is connected with the main building by a covered walk, the roof being supported by columns. An office about the same size as the kitchen, at the other end of main building is connected in like manner. Farther on in the rear of the dwelling is the garden, beautifully laid off in beds, hedged with rows of box-wood. Back of the garden is the slave quarters, where at one time 250 slaves were entertained by the General and Mrs. Washington. The main building is long and narrow; the center was built by a brother of General Washington and afterwards the extensions were built by the general himself. It is built of wood made to imitate stone, is of two stories and an attic—all divided off into comfortable rooms, and no room wasted. The visitor views in turn the old library, the east and west parlors, the dining-room, the room in which the general died, and Mrs. Washington's room, and the room in which she died, and these and others have evidently been kept as nearly in their original manner as possible. On the stone floor portico running the full length of the house in front, facing the Potomac river, is a row of old oak chairs, in one or more of which every visitor takes occasion to sit, with the hope that he may possibly sit where once the father of his country sat. Between the front lawn and the river is the deer park, enclosed by a high iron picket fence. Here may be seen a dozen fine specimens of the deer family. Thus an hour and a half passes away, and the return boat arrives and we take our departure with the one thought uppermost in our minds, that we have visited the real home of George Washington, and have rested under the shade, not of the cherry tree, but of the magnolias, cedars and oaks, some of which were planted by his hands. Soon the boat whistles for the return trip, we leave the sacred shrine and by 4:30 o'clock are again landed in the city under the walls of the lofty monument erected to commemorate a people's veneration for the greatest man of his time.
