

CAN'T STOP IT!

Europe can't stop the trade coming to America because American products are superior. Neither can the trade in this community be stopped coming to our store for clothing so long as we give them superior merchandise—that's the magnet.

ITS NOT SO MUCH WHAT WE SAY, AS WHAT WE DO that brings the customer our way.

Our $10 Suits

have made many friends for the past three weeks. Only a limited number of these values left. Hadn't you better come in and investigate?

Come to us for the blue stripe Carhartt Overalls, Jackets and Shirts. They are the only "all right" kind.

SUPPORTED THE COLONEL.

Private of Company H the Right Leg of Stotsenburg in Battle.

(German Towel in Sunday World-Herald.)

AS I ran breathless through the dark I almost bumped into a little man headed in the same direction.

"Who are you?" he demanded, and by the sharp, incisive tones I recognized Colonel Stotsenburg.

"Towel of Company H," I replied.

"Well, never mind your company, but come with me," he returned, neither slackening his pace for a moment. So, side by side we ran down the rough declivity of the hillside toward the deployed line of our regiment, where the booming of Springfields and the flaming tongues of beautifully even volleys replied to the spiteful crackle of the insurgent rifle fire sputtering from the sweeping arc of trees close to the opposite bank of the narrow San Juan river.

The outbreak of the Philippine insurrection had caught me undressed and ready to turn in for the night. Consequently, after throwing on my clothes and snatching rifle and cartridge belt, I was one of the last of the stragglers to leave the camp and hasten toward the position which I knew to be designated for my company, and that's how I happened to fall in with the colonel.

As we ran toward our line we passed through zones of enflaming fire where the bullets swarmed about our heads and feet like hordes of angry hornets. But although we stumbled and fell at times we were getting along well enough until both of us toppled over a low embankment into a mucky caribao wallow. I scrambled out easily enough, but turned at a groan from the colonel to find that in the fall he had so severely wrenched his right leg and ankle that he could not stand alone. For the moment I was sure that he was wounded, for the bullets were spattering into the water and throwing the mud into our faces.

I got to his side as quickly as I could, and with his arm about my shoulder carried him out of the hole without further mishap. But from that time on, all night long, and half the following day, I acted an anomalous part. I was not an orderly, for whoever heard of an orderly going about with his commanding officer's arm about his neck? Although away from my company, I was not on detached service, for I was very closely attached to the colonel. In short I was no longer Private Towel of Company H, but the right leg of John M. Stotsenburg, colonel of the First Nebraska, U. S. volunteers.

Hobbling, limping, scrambling, stalking through cover, creeping in the open, with the wicked Mauser bullets always dropping in the grass or flashing fire from the rocks in a ceaseless shower of leaden hail, urged on by an indomitable spirit that knew no weariness, and a feverish determination to be everywhere at once, carrying reckless joy and inspiration to his men wherever he appeared, the frail bodied little colonel hurried, dragging his right leg with him. And sometimes over holes and ditches the right leg would pick up the whole body and spring lightly across as though it had carried only a feather. And again, at times when breath failed the colonel, the right leg, unconscious of its sole duties as a pedestrail appendage, would raise a raucous cry and hoarsely voice the whispered commands of the colonel; occasionally in the excitement of the moment forgetting everything and hurling maledictions at the heads of captains and even majors.

The Sunday morning dawned and rifles and cannon boomed the knell for the souls of men, many of them our comrades and best friends. But still the colonel was as ubiquitous and indefatigable as in the night. He paid no attention to the bullets which purred and hissed about his head. Although at times he dodged when he could see a volley fired point blank in our direction, he did it as unconsciously and gracefully as he would lift his hat to a lady. Men were shot down all about him, but he was so intent on watching the big game, that he did not see nor notice. We stood for a moment at the breach of one of the guns of the Utah battery. The colonel had just sighted the gun with his own hands at an alcove in the big church of San Juan del Monte, across the river, when a ragged brass Remington tall tore the whole top off the head of the man who was just in the act of shoving the cartridge into the breech, spattering blood and fragments of brain all over the colonel's clothes. But I am sure he was unconscious of the fact. He turned and calmly gave his commands to the gunner who sprang forward to catch the shell as the dead man was dragged to one side. When General Hale, who rode up at the moment, urged the colonel to get under cover, he appeared not to have heard. Yet withal he was never rash in his courage, and never exposed himself unnecessarily. His skill, coolness, bravery and thoughtfulness for his men in action endeared him to the whole regiment, and won him the most unbounded admiration wherever his name was known.

Before noon of that memorable Sunday the colonel was able to hobble about with a stick, and I was put to carrying orders back and forth along the line, where, perhaps, I did as much good as though I had kept my rifle red hot all day.

FORTY-TWO YEARS AGO.

When the Missouri Bounded Civilization and Nebraska was a Territory.

The finding of an old time invitation the other day, among the interesting relics of H. C. McMacken, was responsible for the recollection of a number of interesting reminiscences by Plattsmouth's veteran ice man. Following is a copy of the invitation much as it was printed, on flowered and tinted paper, now colored and stained with age of forty-two years:

appreciate the amount of pleasure and enjoyment the young people of 42 years ago, the old young people of today, derived from the opportunities of that time.

Clark's was a big saw mill with rough floors of cottonwood, but the early settlers used to gather there by the hundreds and have high old times. The only place in Plattsmouth, Nebraska Territory, which offered such an opportunity for a similar amusement was the big square house of Lloyd Lucas, the first residence to be built on Wintersteen hill. When this house burned to the ground a number of years ago Mrs. Wintersteen built the double house which still stands just east of her residence and which is almost an exact counterpart of the old Lucas house.

Among the well known residents about here who used to attend the dances on Wintersteen hill and at Clark's mill, were Joe Johnson, Andy Taylor, Henry and William Eikenbary, Sam and James Thomas, Ed and Ami Todd, Mrs. Alf White, Mrs. W. J. Streight, Mr. and Mrs. Elam Parmele, —all of whom will recall with more or less vividness the incidents of that time, when they read this article.
