CHAPTER XIX.

The young man had risen and was standing by the table when he turned from the window. He seemed greatly refreshed, his face had lost its livid hue of passion and death and looked the better for a tinge of color. He met our regard boldly, yet with no braggart, bulging air, but the composure of a brave man facing his trial with a consciousness of right upon his side.

to serve his mistress served only to incense her the more against him. But for his apology, he declared that was made the moment he heard of the gentleman's release, at the same time that he restored to him his hat and a pocketbook which had fallen from his pocket.

eastering her eyes round at the work like one in a maze. "If you would prefer an allegory of figures"—says Dario, misconceiving her silence.

reeling in the absence of Dawson that I stood in the position of a guardian to his daughter and was responsible for her welfare, my mind grew very uneasy about the consequences of her extravagant admiration for the painter.

"I suppose I have enough to keep my house in suitable condition." "Without doubt, though I expect such work as Signor Dario's must command a high price."

sponse and exasperate her beyond all endurance, as we could see by her blanched cheek and flashing eye; so, dismissing him with a deep courtesy, she turns on her heel without another word.

He seemed to be eating with all the relish in the world.
