In this column we will publish communications of a worthy and suitable character, received from subscribers to this paper.

Inheritance of Wealth.

A little more than a century ago the thirteen colonies became free and independent states. To gain this freedom they had humbled the king of nations.

In those early days, when each man owned his home, tilled the soil, labored, and produced the wealth upon which he lived; when each woman sat by the fire-side in the evening, singing and turning her spinning wheel; in those days our homes were happy, our people patriotic, and our country prosperous.

There is another problem of no less magnitude and importance than those which we have already settled, that demands our attention. The equal distribution of wealth has never been accomplished. There were slaves and masters in Greece. There were plebs and patricians in Rome.

It is the duty of a nation to look after and guard carefully the welfare of its common people. A nation can hope to exist only so long as it does this, for it is the common people who in time of peace produce the wealth of the country, and who in time of war are its bravest defenders.

Princes and lords may flourish or may fade—A breath can make them as a breath bath made; But a bold peasantry, their country's pride, When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

But how are great differences of wealth and position brought about? How are vast fortunes acquired and maintained? A single example will suffice. The money paid by the king of England, from public taxes, to a tyrannical ruler, for the services of the Hessian soldiers, in the Revolutionary war, formed the starting of the great Rothschild fortune.

To preserve their name, their class distinction, and to keep this wealth together, the Rothschilds compel their heirs to marry within certain family limits, or to persons of a certain high financial standing.

The Rothschild fortune is but a single example of many fortunes that have been amassed, and are being controlled under the present law of inheritance. It is this concentration and perpetuation of large estates that is a danger and a menace to the state.

In Ireland, unhappy Ireland, we see the outcome of such a condition of things. Gradually, and under the cover of law, the English capitalists have gained possession of so much of the land, and wealth of the country that the condition of Irish laborers is no better than the condition of Russian serfs.

Two children born today, the one of lofty parentage, the other of lowly; the one surrounded by luxury and wealth, the other by poverty and want. Neither is responsible for his birth place. Both are American citizens, entitled to equal chances for success.

If the right of inheritance is destroyed, what shall be done with the heritage? To give it to the rich would increase the inequality and be worse than useless. To parcel it out among the poor would be the height of folly; for it would make them careless and shiftless.

The effect of a law limiting the right of inheritance, and making the surplus of all estates revert to the state, would be to change the standard of the ambition of our people.

A newspaper is a necessity.

The Free High School Law.

When the free attendance high school law was enacted in 1895, making a connecting link between our public schools and the state university, it was conceded by the friends of education generally that it was a step in the right direction.

Among our rural schools where we find many of our brightest intellects, many boys and girls who never dared to dream of a high school education, much less of a university course, at once saw the way possible for both.

How many "mute inglorious Miltons here may rest," How many "Cromwells, guiltless of their country's blood," This law was designed to remedy such evils and we believe it was bearing legitimate fruit as may be shown by the answers to a circular letter sent out by State Superintendent Jackson to schools in different parts of the state.

Two NEBRASKANS DROWNED. W. Morton Smith and H. E. Guilmette Capsize on the Hudson.

New York, June 13—Two men were drowned in a cat boat in the Hudson off Fort Lee today. The party on the yacht was made up of Miss Emma Guilmette, her brother H. E. Guilmette, a clerk in the office of Moore and Schley, and W. Morton Smith, employed on the Mail and Express. They sailed on the river until about 3 o'clock when the boat was struck by a squall and went over.

EX-GOVERNOR WAITE

A RECENT INTERVIEW WITH THE MAN OF "BLOODY BRIDLES" FAME.

Says He Is Not an Anarchist and Tells Who Are the Lawless Element—Incidents in a Stormy Career—Working Now in the Field of Co-operation.

"Am I an anarchist? By no means." Hon. Davis H. Waite, ex-governor of Colorado and hero of the famous "Blood to the Bridles" story, the man whom the people of the United States call a fanatic or a patriot according to their leanings, said this with the unmistakable emphasis of sincerity.

"Anarchist means without law. An anarchist is one who acts contrary to law. I deny that I belong in that class, especially since, if thus classified, I would be found in such bad company."

"There are the bankers. They are the leading anarchists of the country. Keep in mind my definition of anarchists. These bankers know that the constitution of the United States says unequivocally that congress shall coin the money of the country. They know, too, that the supreme court of the United States decided in 1884 that greenbacks were issued under the clause of the constitution authorizing congress to issue money; that it is money, and that it fills the requirement of a circulating medium of exchange. Despite this, national banks issue their own notes, which are of the nature of interest drawing loans, in violation of law."

"The railroad companies are anarchists. The courts have decided that railroads are common carriers and that common carriers may not discriminate against any class of customers. If you were to ride in a stage coach the same distance a fellow traveler did, the driver would have no right to charge you $1.50 and the other $1. That is a parallel case. Yet the railroad companies do discriminate in the granting of rebates and by other unjust methods."

"The courts of the United States are anarchists. The constitution of our country, from which they derive their authority, says in substance that there shall be no arrests without warrants and no trials without juries. Yet there are trials without jury and arrests without warrants."

"Congress is an anarchistic body. Its action in arranging for an international monetary conference proves this. It asks foreign powers"—here Colorado's ex-governor drew a deep breath and exclaimed in a tone of disgust, "for God's sake—countries like Belgium, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland, that are controlled by the gold power, to hold a conference to decide whether the United States may adopt bimetalism."

"The biggest anarchist this country ever held was Grover Cleveland, who sent an army into Illinois without a call from the governor or legislature of that state. The constitution says that troops shall not be sent into a state unless a call has been made by the legislature, or, if that be not in session, from the governor. Yet this man sent troops uncalled for into Chicago when they were neither wanted nor needed."

The most famous of Colorado's governors does not look the truculent warrior he is said to be. He is a mild mannered old gentleman, whose bent figure and snowy hair are the only indications that age claims him as her own. He is tall and spare and carries his head far forward, as though a "brown study" were his normal condition. His features are delicate for the masculine order; his eyes small and blue and piercing, though with a certain benignant expression, which his silver bowed spectacles somewhat enhance. He has the healthy, apple glow ascribed by old fashioned novelists to their heroes. His white beard is short and uneven. His clothing is scrupulously neat. His coat is fresh from the brush and his linen faultless, his tie correct. He wears no jewelry except a modest gold watch chain, from which hangs the silver souvenir of the Populist convention held in Omaha in 1892.

His voice is gentle and low toned as a woman's, a well bred woman's at least. His manner in conversation is as gentle as his voice. There is nothing suggestive of the fulminator about him. Everything denotes a kindly old scholar, whose world is bounded by his bookshelves. While he hurls opprobrium upon persons and classes he tempers his words with a pleasant smile. He was elected governor of Colorado on the Omaha platform in 1892; but, said he, "the legislature was not a Populist body, and as a consequence I could do little in my executive capacity. The state of Colorado has never been Populist except in so far as the free coinage of silver was concerned. The other reform principles have always been ignored there."

Denver fire and police boards were appointed by the governor. This being the case, it followed that the executive could compel the observance of the law in those departments. I resolved to prohibit gambling and the sale of liquor on Sunday and after midnight and to close the houses of ill fame in that city. I issued orders to that effect. The police board refused to enforce them. I removed the board. It refused to make way for a new body. I carried the matter into the supreme court of the state. It ruled that I had the right to remove the board. I appointed a new set of men, who carried out my wishes. There may have been some secret gambling after that, but it was confined to gamblers with each other, and every one knows that what a gambler wants is "suckers," not men of his kind. Gambling languished, therefore, and there was a reign of comparative cleanliness in the city. I am not a religiousist; neither am I an athlete. My decriers have made both claims. I am, however, strongly in favor of law and order, and my Sabbath closing laws were in the interest of these.

He both votes for gold and writes his notes for gold; still there are thousands of friends and deadbeats in the city who shout for him.—Denver Road.
