

fraternal of queries in the two little words, and he lifted her hand, the one with the ring on the finger, and kissed it.

"Yes, the man who put this ring on your finger."

She bent above him till her eyes eclipsed the stars. "Do you think you love me better than he does?" she said softly. "You've known me only a few months, and he— he has known me all my life."

The young man groaned. "Don't tell me you love him, Leta; I couldn't stand that."

"But I do." There were hurrying steps in the road above them, and the flickering light of a lantern cut yellow swaths in the starlight. She bent lower, and again her lips brushed his forehead. "You wouldn't want me not to love my own father, would you? It was mother's ring, and he gave it to me."

This was how it came about that the major, coming hastily with an improvised stretcher borne by an ashen hued David, found the young man on his feet with Leta in his arms, and when they had all gone back to the house it took the better half of a fresh cigar on Russell's part and two chargings of the long stemmed pipe on the major's to work out the explanation on the vile shadowed veranda. When it was made, the case of one David Jackson came up for trial and sentence. "He's your man, my son," said the major. "Of course he's a grand rascal, and it's your privilege to send him to the coal mines, but—"

"But a southern gentleman wouldn't invoke the law because an ignorant negro was terrified enough to knock him down, you would say. Well, neither shall I. Indirectly, he has been the means of making me the happiest man on top of the earth."

This may account for David's reappearance on the lawn three days later when Russell was again a guest at the Dickson cottage. They were waiting for Mam' Sephny to call them to dinner, and Russell was showing the major and Leta the pictures taken on the eventful evening of assaults and happinesses.

"He looks peaceful enough now," said the young man, with a glance at David. "You'd hardly recognize him as the fellow who posed for this."

The photograph was a study in ferocity, and the livid scar stood out on the pictured face like the welt of a broad whiplash.

"It's simply horrifying," said Leta, shuddering. "But that is a beautiful picture of Mam' Sephny. Come here, mammy, and see how you look to other people."

The ancient negress had just come out to announce dinner, and she vouchsafed no more than a single contemptuous eye sweep.

"Hub! Dat ole siggah wench me? No, ma'am! I ain't no-wha's high as ole an uppy-as dat." Then she caught sight of the grotesque ferocity. "Faw de Lawd's sake, young mahsteh, gimme dat one, please! Wha!—wha!—yo' git dat?"

Russell gave her the picture, and once more the old eyes filled with tears.

"Dat's my Geo'ge Washinton Allig-zandah Dickson, growed up an come to be a main. Dat's de same scar what he got ag'in de ole hot stove in ole missis' kitchen! Oh, mahsteh, wha' you all git dat?"

The man on the lawn had dropped his rake and started toward the house. The major rose.

"I mistrust David's your own boy, sure enough, mammy. I recollect that scar myself," he declared. And when the old woman tottered down the steps, with her trembling arms spread wide, the soft-hearted veteran seized upon the two young people and marched them to the farther end of the long veranda.

"I reckon the dinner'll have to wait awhile," he said. "She's been waiting thirty odd years, you know." After which, with an inclusive arm sweep, meant to cover a speedy retreat into generalities, "Do you have any mo' delightful prospect than this up yonder in your country, Mr. Russell?"

And so they discussed the view and killed time with set purpose, while around on the front steps an old negro mother rocked herself back and forth, crying softly and trying to hold a stalwart giant in her arms, as she had long ago held her lost man-child.

Schoenlein and Gun Cotton.

On March 18, 1846, Schoenlein wrote to Faraday:

"I am enabled to prepare in any quantity a matter which, next to gunpowder, must be regarded as the most combustible substance known. So inflammable is this matter that on being brought in contact with the slightest spark it will instantly be set on fire, leaving hardly any trace of ashes, and if the combustion be caused within closed vessels a violent explosion takes place. What shall I do with that matter? Shall I offer it to your government?"

Having perfected his remarkable discovery, he visited England in August with the view of securing patent rights, and he then writes to Faraday as follows:

"The affair which has brought me over to England refers to my explosive cotton, which I have so much improved that it has all the appearance of becoming a dangerous rival to gunpowder. As to its explosive power, 'gun cotton,' as I call it, is very superior to powder. In given cases one part of it does the work of four parts of powder, and under the most favorable circumstances the force of gun cotton is as two to one that of powder. In the course of the last two months I have made many experiments with cannons, mortars, rifles, etc., and obtained results which I am allowed to call highly satisfactory. The same may be said with regard to blasting rocks."—Letters of Faraday and Schoenlein.
