Homes in Oregon

Salt Lake City, Utah, June 17, 1901.

For various reasons it was impossible to forward articles during the past two weeks. After hurriedly passing over the advantages offered us in Idaho, to be taken up more in detail later, we next come to the state of Oregon. The territory visited covered the eastern and western sections of the great state. Entering at Huntington and continuing northward to the state line, one passes through perhaps the greatest wheat producing belt in the west, the yield per acre being unsurpassed. The topography of this part of the state is undulating. The soil is rich and very productive, and the climate temperate. Fruits of all kinds yield in abundance. The entire country is well settled, and is under a good state of cultivation.

By leaving the railroad some distance, one can yet secure good farm land at moderate prices. The land offered in this section of the state at a figure coming within our reach, and sufficient area can be secured to meet our requirements. As stated before, this is principally a wheat producing section. While there are large sheep interests in the interior, wheat forms the principal agricultural product. Large mining interests are also met, and are doing much towards enhancing the material interests of the state. The large wheat farms heretofore operated are gradually being reduced into smaller holdings. The country is well drained by numerous streams of pure water. Good railroad facilities exist, being traversed by the Oregon Short Line and tributary branches over its entire extent.

I shall not go into details as to statistical data, showing the annual production of the various commodities, as that would take much time in preparing and more space than can be allotted for the purpose. Reliable information may be obtained on this subject by writing to Mr. A. L. Craig, at Portland, Oregon, who will take pleasure in providing any one with reliable data.

The state of Oregon presents several distinct climates, produced by the course of its mountain ranges and proximity to the sea. The country lying west of the Coast Range is very mild, has a heavy rainfall and is covered with dense forests of finest timber. Volumes might be written on the magnificent forests of Oregon alone. It is necessary to personally see the mammoth trees of this region in order to form any idea as to their dimensions. There are single trees which will cut as much lumber as can be produced from an acre of timber land in eastern states. Besides enormous quantity, the quality is of the best. Trees without a limb or blemish two hundred feet in height and of large diameter are common. A great variety of native grasses abound in this balmy region, making it especially well adapted for dairying purposes.

This portion of the state is as yet comparatively sparsely settled, but is receiving more attention from the home-seekers, as railroads are being extended into its vast forests. Those who have made their homes in this part of the state are well pleased, and are profuse in their praises. Cold is unknown, and flowers bloom the year round. The greater part of the coast country is undulating, developing into hills of considerable elevation as the mountain range on the east is approached. Much might be said favorable to this part of Oregon, but as a location for our Home Makers there exist difficulties which would operate against success. It would require much hard labor to remove the timber, after which the greatest task of all would be encountered, namely the removal of the monster stumps. True, the timber itself would produce a handsome profit above the cost of the land, but for our large membership to undertake its development presents too many hardships which are not encountered in other places with equal natural advantages. It is our aim to so locate our members that they can immediately begin to enjoy the fruits of their labors, which cannot be done where the ground must first be cleared of heavy growth. In this case, it is the succeeding generations that usually reap the benefits of the toil of their predecessors.

Crossing the Coast Range to the east, one comes into the great valley of the Willamette river. This valley is enclosed on the east by the Cascade Range, and is several hundred miles in length. The soil varies, but on the whole is exceedingly productive. Fruits of the very finest quality are produced, and wheat, barley, oats, hops, etc., yield well. Dairying also plays an important part, and its products find good markets. The valley from Portland to the headwaters of the Willamette is well settled and under a high state of cultivation. Land prices range high for good locations. There are, however, large individual holdings which can be secured at lower prices. The Home Makers Company has many offers of land in this valley, but as a rule not in large enough bodies. The rainfall is not so great as beyond the Coast Range, yet sufficient to make irrigation unnecessary. Many thriving cities are found, and all the various manufacturing industries are represented. A fine system of schools afford all advantages to be enjoyed in eastern states. Its citizens are enterprising and progressive, and extend a most hospitable hand to all newcomers.

Going on further south and passing over another range of mountains brings us into what is known as the Rogue river country. This country resembles the Willamette valley in many respects, differing perhaps somewhat in climatic conditions and rainfall, the latter being heavier in the western portion. The settlement is not quite so dense, yet all choice locations are held at a fairly high price. Many populous towns and villages are found with the usual industries in a thriving condition. The natural markets for the products of this region are Portland and San Francisco, where much of it is exported. East of the Rogue river country lies a comparatively new country which will later on offer openings for home-seekers, but at present is unavailable, reference is had to the Lake Klamath country, which is as yet
