WHO DID IT?

There is a good deal of discussion concerning the origin of the reforms that are now sweeping the country and some politicians, or their friends for them, are claiming them as "my policies." The truth about the matter is that these reforms were first proposed and discussed in the farm houses, in the lodges of the Knights of Labor and in the labor unions. That is as true in England as in the United States. There John Burns first forced them on the attention of the British people and those who were in power. They were not adopted in any nation until the labor element got the balance of power in Australia and New Zealand. It was from Australia that we got our secret ballot system. There are men living in Omaha today who have seep gangs of men go to their boss and get tickets and then hold them above their heads until they were deposited in the box, so that the boss could know for a certainty that the man voted as directed.

The regulation of railroads, and for that matter all natural monopolies, was advocated by the same class of people before any man now prominently before the public and claiming them as "my policies" ever said a word on the subject. There was an anti-monopoly party with a ticket in the field in Nebraska thirty years ago made up of farmers and labor unionists. It was the arguments that they submitted upon which the present anti-trust law is based.

More than that, some of the most abstruse questions in political economy, questions that had perplexed the rightly solved and made popular by the "learned" for a hundred years, were same class of people. They understood the "quantitative theory" of money, advocated it in their platforms and flooded the country with cheaply printed pamphlets, which were paid for out of their poverty, and made it so thoroughly understood that it would now be impossible for any set of men by law to expand and contract the currency for their own benefit.

If anyone asks who made all these important principles popular the correct answer is: The common people did it.—Omaha World-Herald.

Like father, misjudged son.

Early to rise and early to bed was first remarked by a bloke that's dead.
