MY FRIEND SPARLING.

A Troubled Conscience and a Haunt ing Presence. I am a manufacturer and dealer in gravestones and monuments. There are three men who habitually associate death with business—the doctor, the undertaker and the tombetone maker. I have the finer feelings and sentiments of the average man, yet my occupation has led me to regard the the great and solemn change chiefly from a business point of view. That men should die has seemed to me as a matter of course, and as a necessary means for the support of myself and family. Still, death may produce a great shock in me, as was the case w th that of my friend Sparling.

We had been friends from boyhood. He lived near me; my way to and from business led past his house. I met him almost daily. Mutual assistance over some of the hard places in life, a similarity of tastes, and frequent interchange of thought and opinion had endeared each of us to the other.

For a week I had been busy with preparations for a long business tour. It was to last three months. The day before my departure I had met Sparetor of Warner's ling and had said to him: "I am going on another tour. Lest we should not meet to-morrow, let us say goodbye now." We separated with a hearty hand-shake and the friendliest of farewells.

I was to take the evening train of the next day. My ticket for New Orleans was in my pocket, my trunk packed, the parting with those at home was over, and the hack was taking me to the station. The afternoon paper was in my hand; I opened it and the following paragraph caught my eve:

SUDDEN DEATH- As we go to press the painful news reaches us of the death of our esteemed citizen, Ezra Sparling, which occurred at his residence about three o'clock this afternoon. The occurrence will be as startling as painful to his host of friends and acquaintances, as the deceased has apparent ly been in the best of health. The cause was probably heart disease. Particulars are necessarily deferred till our next issue."

The paper dropped from my hand; the shock made me faint for a moment Sparling dead! I could not comprehend it

The back had just turned into the street on which was his house. I looked at my watch; there was not one moment to spare.

Shall I tell the truth, that this certainly gave me great relief, just then? I, of all men, should be with the afflicted family in that dark hour; and here was an excellent excuse for the non-performance of the sad duty. I shrank, as all do, from the disagreeable task.

The back went swiftly to the house: the driver knew he had no time to lose. I saw in the twilight that the blinds were closed; two or three neighbors were on the front steps. I had a glimpse of a woman doing something at the door. "Putting crape on the knob," I said to myself and the scene disappeared like some fleeting picture conjured up by the memory.

So my journey was commenced with a heavy heart I looked about anx ously for somebody at the station who could tell me more about my friend's death. Nobody could. The two or three with whom I was able to to me as one from the grave." exchange a few words about it before the express came and went knew what I did and no more. They had seen the brief newspaper announcement, and that was all.

I lay awake two hours that night after my berth in the sleeper was made up. thinking of poor Sparling, of his bereaved fam ly, and what I ought to do in the premises. It was an unusual occasion with me; nobody, left the gap in my life that this man would leave. Naturally, I began to condemn myself for hastening away as I had done, after learning of Ezra's death. To be sure my plans were all previously made, and the three days' delay that would be necessary in offering my consolations to the family and attending the funeral would be inconvenient. That was all, merely a little derangement of my plans, not even involving my business loss. I became angry and dissatisfied with myself as these reflections proceeded, and tried to excuse by conduct by the ples that the news had come upon me so suddenly that I had no time for calm reflection necessary to a change of plan. My conscience was a stern monitor, and would not excuse me so easily. "He would never have acted thus toward you," was its coment upon my apologies. I tossed about uneasly; proposed in my mind that I would get off at Cloveland and return home; resolved the next moment that I would do nothing of the kind, but would send a long telsgram to the widow, explaining the necessity of my absence and tendering my sympathy; decided next that this would be an absurd thing to do-and at last fell to sleep with nothing settled. When I awoke I was three hundred miles from home, and Cleveland was an hour behind me. I tried to put away my thoughts of Sparling.

and fix my mind on business. It would not do. The man who attempts to fight a battle with his conscience is dways in the wrong, always sure of defeat. go on I left the car, and in a fever of impatience walked the station until I could take a return train.

From the probabilities of such oceasions I had settled it in my mind that Sparling would be buried on the afternoon of the third day from that of his death. Time-tables were studied, conductors interrogated, and it was made certain that I ought in due course to reach home at three o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

That would be a very close thing, I reflected. There would be, probably, only time for me to take a carriage and join the procession to the cemetery. Much distressed in mind, I resolved to do this, if circumstances admitted of nothing more.

But even this poor privilege was denied me. There were maddening delays and detentions; it was not until midnight of the third day that I left the train at the home station.

My state of mind admits of no description. I feared to learn the truth; I would not inquire if the funeral had taken place. There were no carriages there at that hour and I walked alone through that deserted streets.

There was a full moon and the gas lamps were not lighted. But the time was July, and the foliage often vailed the moonbeams.

The force of habit led me through the street where Sparling had lived. I would not think of calling at that untimely hour. I must learn the particulars of the funeral at home, but in my remorseful condition of mind it seemed to me the correct thing to do to walk slowly past the house of the mourning, and abase my soul before it.

As I neared the gate I saw a tall figure leaning on it. The form and the attitude were so familiar to me as to strike me through with terror. I halted

The face was slowly turned toward me. It looked white in the vague moonlight; pale and very sorrowful. It was Sparling's.

I grew cold from head to foot. With what little strength was left me I tried to cross the street.

A timorous glance back over my shoulder showed me that it was following. Swiftly, straight it came after

I could have prayed for wings to fly with me away from the terrors of that place.

A smile broke over the sad face: so like his smile. In the sudden revulsion of my feelings I fainted.

Somebody fanned me with a nat. I opened my eyes; it was leaning over

A Two-ton Gem.

An interesting section of petrified wood, which stands a short distance behind the main entrance door of Tiffany's will not fail to attract the attention of scientists as well as those fond of looking at curious things. The block is an immense one, weighing 4,200 pounds and measuring 401 by 33 inches and 34 inches high. It is of agatized wood and came from the petrified forests at Chalcedonia Park, Arizona, near Corriza, and 20 miles from the nearest railroad station. It was brought on to this city through the efforts of Mr. George F. Kunz, of Tiffany's and is the largest block of the kind ever brought east and polished. Mr. Kunz had no idea that he could secure so large a section for the inspection of New York people. Other pieces of the petrified wood have been brought on from these forests, but none which approach this specimen in size. The wood is used to make up into table tops and handsome wood ornsmention. The polished surface shows a beautiful blending of yellow and black, and in some respects resembles the red wood of the big California trees. Some idea of the hardness of the wood can be gained when it is known that 200 pieces of marble can be sawed up while one piece of the agatized wood is being cut.

The piece of wood is very valuable, and for a time was placed outside the door on the street. It is the biggest gem that has ever been placed outside of Tiffany's unguarded. It is needless to say that no one tried to walk off with

Of General R. B. Ayres, of the artil-lery, it is related that he was in command of a detachment of Union troops who during the civil war burned the house of a Virginian Confederate. The wife of the Virginian fled from the house with her baby in her arms, and, seeking refuge in the negro quarters, was forced to fly again when the torch was applied to them in turn. Seventeen years afterward the Union officer, Gen. Ayres, married the baby, who had grown into a charming young womanhood.
