The necessity for a law providing for the election of United States senators by the people is greater than ever before. The legislature of two states adjourned without electing a senator, thus leaving it for the governor to appoint one. That is not the proper thing to do, and the sooner a change is made in the law the better it will be.

The United States senate has a working democratic majority. This is the next session will be looked forward to with a good deal of interest. The quartette of populist in the senate will amount to naught as the much-desired balance of power between the two old parties has gone glimmering.
