At last, after many months of darkness. Sig. Crispi, Italy's aged statesman, is able to see, owing to the removal of a extaract from each eye. The other day he rose with the bandages sell nominally on, but after breakfast he was led to an open window of the Villa Lina, where he lives in Naples, under which stretches the glorious bay, with its islands and smoking sentinel, glittering as only the Mediteranean can in the su, and the cloths were removed. As his eyes became accustomed to the smilight and fell upon his favorite view, he drew a long brooth and his eyes filled with tears. After a rest the aged, statesman had the pleasure of opening his own letters and telegrams, of which many were congratulations.
