IT IS A BINDING TIE.

Wireless Telegraphy Has Taken Away the Mystery of the Sea.

The equipping of ocean greyhounds with the Marconi system has taken away part of the dread and mystery of the sea. Steamships can now communicate with one another or with the shore at a distance of hundreds of miles, the case of the American liner Philadelphia, which talked with Poldhu from mid-ocean, 1,551 miles, on Feb. 22, 1902, coming to mind. Recently the Philadelphia and the Lucania played a chess game en route, and a plan of supplying liners with daily news from shore at $5 a day is now being contemplated. In April, 1899, the Goodwin Sands lightship off the English coast, was struck in a collision, and with her Marconi apparatus was able to send for assistance across twelve miles of ocean. Life-saving stations along the coast of England have frequently received warning, by the wireless system attached to outlying lighthouses, that vessels were drifting ashore through the fog. When the invention is perfected so that the weather bureau can flash warnings from shore stations to the coasting fleet plying the coastwise lanes a great step will have been taken; but at present the tests of this nature, owing to the various atmospheric disturbances, have not met with complete success.
