The old question of temperature comes to the front this winter as usual. A reader of the Farmers Review gives this little piece of information, which may be of use to some: He says that last winter he kept a thermometer in his house and another outside. He was astonished to see how little difference there was between the two, only four or five degrees, as a general thing. He nailed paper over the inside of his house and that raised the difference two or three degrees, but not nearly as much as he had hoped. This fall he has been putting coal ashes into his hen house, principally to act as an absorbent. It has seemed to do more than that. One morning recently, when the thermometer out of doors was about 18 degrees below the freezing point, he went into his hen house to take away a pan of water he had left there the previous night. He expected to find it frozen solid, but instead he found it not yet reduced to the congealing point, while the temperature around him was as high as desirable for poultry in winter time, and the hens seemed to be happy. He is of the opinion that the foot of ashes over the floor prevented a good deal of cold from getting in, for there is no doubt that a great deal of cold does come up through the floor. It is a good idea to look after the warmth of the floor as well as the sides, ends and roof of the house—Nebraska Farmer.

There is considerable difference of opinion in dairy circles on the subject of washing butter, the camps being divided into the washers and non-washers. Those who advocate the reduction of washing to the minimum claim that much washing injures the flavor. On the other side, it is maintained that insufficient washing destroys the keeping quality. Both contentions are true. Much washing does remove a flavor that is exceeding palatable in fresh butter. On the other hand, unless the casein be expelled by pretty thorough washing when the butter granules are small, cheesy or rancid flavor is pretty certain to develop after a brief time. The proper determination of the question will therefore depend upon the use that is to be made of the product. If the butter is to be immediately consumed a very little washing will meet all the requirements and preserve the flavor desired so much. On the other hand, if a good keeper is wanted, it will be necessary to remove the casein quite completely.—Ex.

THE CONFLICT.
Every man who has good health, every man with good sense, every one who has had his dinner and has enough left for supper, is, to that extent, a capitalist. Every man with a good character, who has the credit to borrow a dollar, or to buy a meal, is a capitalist; and nine out of ten of the great capitalists of the United States are simply successful workmen. There is no conflict, and there can be no conflict, in the United States, between capital and labor; and the men who endeavor to excite the envy of the poor, are the enemies of law and order. As a rule, wealth is the result of industry, of economy, and of attention to business; and as a rule, poverty is the result of idleness, of extravagance, and of inattention to business, though to these rules there are thousands of exceptions. The man who has wasted his time, who has thrown away his opportunities, is apt to envy the man who has not. For instance, there are six shoemakers working in one shop. One of them attends to his business. You can hear the music of his hammer late and early. He is in love with some girl on the next street. He has made up his mind to be a man, to succeed, to make somebody else happy, and to have a home; and while he is working, in his imagination he can see his own fireside, with the light falling on the faces of his wife and child. The other five gentlemen work as little as they can, spend Sunday in dissipation, have the headache on Monday and, as a result, never advance. The industrious one, the one, in love, gains the confidence of his employer, and in a little while he cuts out work for the others. The first thing you know is that he has a shop of his own, the next, a store; because the man of reputation, the man of character, the man of known integrity, can buy all that he wishes. The next thing you know is that he is married, has built him a house, and is happy. His dream has been realized. After awhile the same five shoemakers, having pursued the old course, stand on the corner on some Sunday when he rides by. He has a carriage; his wife sits by his side, her face covered with smiles; and they have two children, their eyes beaming with joy; and the blue ribbons are fluttering in the wind. Thereupon the five shoemakers adjourn to some neighboring saloon; and they pass a resolution that there is an irrepressible conflict between capital and labor. (R. G. INGERSOLL.) in Boston Investigator.
