Last Monday night at 20 minutes to twelve o'clock the residence of ye editor was struck by lightning, the chimney torn off and the roof damaged. The bolt seemed to strike the chimney fair and scattered the brick on the north, west and south of the building. From there it followed down the east side of the roof and to the valley which joined the "L" to the main building, tearing the shingles up and making kindling wood of a part of one rafter. Near the valley it took a downward course and came out under the porch roof. No other evidence of the main bolt was noticeable except that a few boards in the porch floor was torn up, seemingly from underneath. There was, however, a heavy electric current which came down the chimney and into the sitting room, lighting up the room and filling it with a hot current of electricity. It also drove some brick bats half way across the room. Ye editor, being the only member of the family awake at the time and near the chimney was slightly dazed. Fortunately no other damage other than above reported occurred.
