Wood's Hole, Mass .- Of all the res cues in these parts for years the great est was made the other night when Capt. Sam Jackson and Frank Veede. brought 18 men to Cuttyhunk island in a dory and vawl after pounding seas had put the life saving outfit out of business. But for the heroism of these two men the entire force of the Cuttyhunk station would have gone down, together with the crew of the new barkentine Stephen G. Hart, bound from Gulfport, Miss., to Boston, with lumber and driven by storm and cross-currents on a reef off the island. The barkentine stranded in a fo and was not spied by the station look out until she had tossed on her jagged bed for several hours. Her signals told that she was fast filling and that help must come quickly to be of any use. Not knowing how many lives might depend on their getting to the wreck in a hurry, all the men at the station turned out and to make sure of room for everybody, they towed the surf boat behind the big power craft. Two of the island fishermen named Cornell volunteered for the trip with

When they climbed on board the Hart part of her keel had settled on the reef with the receding tide, which steadied her a bit, but made hauling her off out of the question. power dory, and Veeder, with a small yawl and dory that he had in some way managed to pilot unaided through the heaving waters, reached the scene and stood by to lend a hand if wanted.

Eighteen would have crowded the station surfboat in smooth weather. The tempest then thundering set her crazy. Overboard went the dunnage of the ship's crew, but the boat behaved no better. She lurched and plunged and took flying leaps across the tops of the waves without making headway and then turned somersault, sprawling the 18 into the sea. Fourteen regained the surfboat and clung to its upturned keel. Capt. Sam. made for them. The swift and violent see-saw of the water hurled his dory on the turtle back to which the crew were clinging and shoved a streak of school of about 20 man-eaters that daylight through the dory's hull. The 14 pulled themselves aboard, however, and she headed top speed for shore, the rescued crew stuffing their clothing into the cracks in her bottom to keep down the leak. Veeder jumped into his dory when the surfboat upset, and, letting his yawl take its chances adrift, went to the rescue of the four of the eighteen Oyster Bay.-Noah Seeman, who red with the blood of the fish, the who had nothing to cling to except the boiling waves. They were so nearly gone when he reached them that they could give him no help in hauling them in. The dory kept its balance while he lifted them from the water by dead weight and dumped them one by one in safe places. By the time he rescued his drifting yawl the four were able to help him row her to the island.
