Thought of the Week

Friendship:

Life has no blessing than a prudent friend.—Euripides

It looks as if the new 45 minute lunch period at old L. H. S. will be a success, everyone seems to enjoy themselves with the things that have been provided for them.

I hear that a certain D. B. is a very good writer of love letters. I wonder if J. M. could tell me anything about this.

The double assembly Wednesday morning was to award the football team. One of our teen agers (Nolen Davis) received the letter for being on the reserve team. "Good work Nolen."

Albert: Mom, you know that vase was sitting on the stairs in the hall?

Mom: Yes

Albert: You don't have to worry about it anymore.

Mom: Why?

Albert: Because, it is broken in a million pieces.

Last Week: Interesting African Institutions

African Religion

The African believes in a world of spirits, and is guided daily by them. He believes in God, and that man is immortal. He also believes that his spirit can never die. When referring to the custom on the Gold Coast of Africa, Casely Hayford says, "You should watch him as he takes offerings of food and drink to the grave-side. There he carefully sets a chair for the dear one gone before, then places them all in order, and pours out a libation, addressing the spirit of the departed relatives hovers around him by day as well as by night, and he has both the physical and the spiritual sense to perceive its presence. He sees in the maniferous bat, winging its flight from room to room at night in the home once dear to the loved one, who is supposed to dominate it, a kindly providence which does not leave him all forlorn in his grief, but sends the spirit of the departed back occasionally to watch and to protect. He even speaks to it in endearing terms at times, and would fain believe that it understands and is in full sympathy with him. You may sneer at the seeming simplicity of the native, mind, but the Aborigines believe that there are mysteries, in this world yet unrevealed to man. He, the native, implicitly believes in ghosts, and has many an authentic story to tell of some strange visitation which he has experienced. Nay, more, his sense of small detects the presence of a ghost in a house. The African looks beyond his present surroundings to the world hereafter where he hopes to meet every member of his family. This is like the religion that is manifested in our churches in America. He doesn't feel it matters so much what happens today as long as he can look forward to the world hereafter. He goes through life contently in this happy frame of mind.

The meaning of God differs throughout Africa. They have what they term, "River Gods" and "Sun Gods." They believe that God brings the radiant sunshine, the pale delicate moon, and the many other beauties of nature. The African's story of the Creation differs only a little from the story handed down from us.

We've often heard how difficult it is for missionaries to "Christianize the Africans." This is because the African understands his own religion and feels that it is just as good as the religion brought by the missionaries.
