The Saga of Long School

By Rubie W. Shakespeare.

This week our paper is dedicated to Long School of Omaha, Neb.

For many, many years, Negro teachers have tried to get in the Omaha Public School System. For many years also, qualified Negro Teachers have been turned down. A few years ago, Omaha woke up and realized that teachers could not be denied the right to make this world a better educated one because of race. Negro teachers were hired! Many people are not exactly happy about it because most of the schools in which they are placed are in schools with predominately Negro students, and they feel that they are placed discriminatorily. Perhaps they are right! At present, this is not the issue at hand. For now we are studying the well qualified teachers. Six teachers teach at schools where there are both Negro and children of other races and find that the children respect them as they do any other teacher.

Omaha is a large metropolitan city of fifty-five elementary schools and five public high schools. It has over 1,000 teachers. Twenty-two of these teachers are Negroes. Therefore, about two per cent of the teachers in the system are colored. Of over 1,000 teachers, one hundred and sixty-one members have their master's degrees. Of twenty-two Negro teachers, twenty-two percent of them have their master's degrees. Compare this with the percentage of the master's degrees in the system as a whole. Omaha teachers who have not graduated from college are many in number, but every teacher at Long school has graduated from college and has received his B.A. or B.S. degree.

Long School has one of the finest educational records of any elementary school in Omaha and perhaps in the country. In most instances, those with master's degrees teach in high school or college.

Here is Long's wonderful record:

All thirteen teachers and the
