Original Tale.

[Written for the Nebraska Advertiser.]

AUNT HANNAH.

BY TOM TURNIP.

Married with Shakespeare.

That was the motto of Aunt Hannah, and had been almost from time immemorial; that was the motto most prominent in the columns of her memorandum, for the last twenty years, at any rate, and it occupied, at forty-five, as prominent a station as ever. It was a snare she never left unadjusted, a sail in her canvass that she never allowed to be furled.

The title of "Aunt Hannah" had been bestowed upon her more out of respect by the surrounding community than the actual facts suggested, for she hadn't a nephew or niece to my knowledge, on the face of the earth; nor ever had. Still she was, not an outcast, for she earned a livelihood by training the "infant mind" of the neighborhood school, which task she accomplished with wonderful facility, at least in her own mind.

Whether her social affections had received a shock in youth, by placing them for safe-keeping in the hands of some inconstant lover, I am truly unable to say, though I rather incline to think not; yet when she, in conversation, reverted back to youthful days, she commonly heaved a sigh or two before the subject was dropped. It seemed she had a general antipathy for young folks in general, and "sweet sixteen," in particular. In fact, she was a perfect sample of "old maidism" in general, with the exception perhaps that the strong hopes of future wedded felicity never "died in her bosom."

"Tis a long lane that has no turn," is the language of an old adage and it proved, strange to say, true enough in her case. A burly, red-faced countryman whose first "better half" had proved to be his greatest earthly treasure, was struck by the "charms" of Aunt Hannah and considering that she had for a sufficient time been,

"Wasting her fragrance on the desert air," laid siege to her affections in so masterly a manner that the people, ere the winter school she was teaching in the vicinity, was half out, began to talk secretly among themselves of the expected match.
