Poetry.
The Crossing at Fredericksburg.

BY GEORGE H. BOKER.
I lay in my tent at mid-day,
Too full of pain to die,
When I heard the voice of Burnside,
And an answering shout reply.

"O comrades, open the curtain,
And see where our men are bound,
For my heart is still in my bosom
At that terrible, martial sound."

"Where go they?" "Across the river,"
"O God! and must I lie still,
While that drum and that measured tramping
Move from us far down the hill?"

"How many?" "I judge, four hundred,"
"Who are they?" "I'll know to a man,"
"Ours own Nineteenth and Twentieth,
And the Seventh Michigan."

"O, go! but to go with my comrades!
Tear the curtain away from the look;
For I'll see them march down to their glory,
Ill-perish by the look!"

They layed in the rocking shallops,
Then offered where we could get
And the breeze was alive with laughter
Till the lastest began to row.

Then the shore, where the Rebels barbed,
Was fringed with a gush of flame,
And landing, like bees, o'er the water
The swarms of their bullets came.

Celebrating Morgan's Death.

The first Tuesday in October has been agreed upon by all "beasts of burden" as a day of thanking and praise to Gen.
Gillon and his command, for the timely and religious act of terminating the life,

Mules, of high and low degree, will convene in their lots and pastures, in the open air, and their devotion will be led by Baptist preachers, who, standing in wa-
