He'd no particlar name-the boy-Put his pardner, Sloapy Seth, Christened him Little Bloody— Which tickled him most to death,

Furfitin' and tistin' rum,

They lived and loafed at the tavern, A lonesome place in the Brakes, On the skurts of the Rotten Holler, Whar's agur, 'n things, 'n' snakes.

One nite a white-topt farmer,

With horse and wagon and truck, Stopt thar, cos it 'was stormin' but, And he'd got a kinder stuck. He'd a barl of blue-nose whisky

He stowed on the tavern floor; Wich, Til suck as dry as a charcoal log," Bill, by the turnal, swore. So he went for that lonely stranger,

And slit his gizzard chung, Then stove the cork with his bowe-knife, And put his lips to the bung.

Then he sucked at that barl nv whisky, Livery, Feed, & Exchange Stables

And he kept his word, and kept it true; He sucked until be couldn't rise: Then he gave a grunt and wallered round, And showed the white of his eyes,

When Bill woke up, he swore they'd got A smoke-stack down his threat, An was Orin' up in his lungs with pitch, And he was a racin' boat.

But he set up straight and guv a snort Betwixt a oath and a snore, He'd kept his guzzle against the bung Till his vat cud hold no more,

But Little Bloody, where was he? Stretched out on the pine-wood floor, He kept his guzzle against the bung Till he reashed the unknown shore,

Blind staring up the way ov the sky-A small white corpse he war, For he'd kept his guzzle ag not the bung, And never cud drink no more.

Bill Gulch looked straight at the little A-chokin' a sqar old sigh ;

Then he flopped fair down on his marrer

Now, I ain't much on the plous lay, But this I say right here, Thar was more religion into that sigh, And goodness into that tear.

Then all the prayin' and preachin' done By folks that hard their stamps For feedin' the poor, and erectin' schools An' reclaimin' little scamps,
