PAYING TOLL.

The night was clear-the stars were bright, The silver moon shone full and fair; The frosty wind was bracing cold, And keen and cutting was the air. Half-hidden 'neath the furry robes, We nestled closely side by side; What cared we for the biting cold ?-For Sue and I were out to ride.

Our nag was swift, our runners smooth-We plied the whip with fervent zeal; And soon we left the town beined, Our sleigh-bells ringing peat on peal. The music of the silver bells Rang out a soft and thrilling chime,

With which my Sasie's mellow voice And merry laugh kept tune and time. Sue held the whip, I held the reins; I found my left arm out of use; Where did I put it?—can't you guess?
Why, round her waist, you silly goose! With nothing but our neads in sight!
Why should we blush? No one could see

"What makes you laugh, and look so droll
"You little frightened dunce," said I,
"We've only stopped to pay the toll." We were alone-out in the night,

Pay toll! To whom-and why-and bow ! There's no one here to pay it to, What do you mean, you horrid thing?" Said I: "Just wait a moment, Suc, See! over yonder comes a man!"
She turned her head—and then I stole, As quick as thought a hearty kiss! And so drove on-I'd paid the toll.

She boxed my ears-but what of that? I gave a kiss for every blow, Till she was glad to be quite still, Way down beneath the buffare And every bridge we passed, that night She'd creep out from her sheltered hol Put her red line close up to mine.
