IMPERSONAL JOURNALISM. The leading editors of this country have nearly all written articles of late condemning "personal journalism," into which the press of the United States has so far drifted of late years, and there was but one editor treated the subject with derision, and that is DANA, the MUNCHANSEN of the American press, from whose pen nearly every sensational report touching the probity of leading statesmen have emanated during the past few

Especially is personalism between editors derogatory both to readers and writers. Editors should be men of character, and, as a class, we believe they are. But the reading of our newspapers would lead people to believe that editors were graduates from the slums of society, or that the truth was not in them. We believe in the old English, Ir-

It is worthy of note that the Epi zootle which is sweeping across the country has awakened, in some quarters, the attention of the public to the fact that in this great country of ours we are sadly deficient in advantages to obtain knowledge in the veterinary hard." arts, if, indeed, not in skillful veterinarians.
