Written for the Advertiser. Between two locks a strife arose, (Not locks of hair-they'll do for prose,) Both claimed the foremost rank and place To guard by night the human race. Says number one, "'Tis plain to see The highest rank belongs to me; I bar the prison door, and stand To save from pillage, all the land,"

"That may be so," says Number Two; "And it seems great to such as you! But, Brigadier, I guard each door, In all the land, for rich and poor." "And as a slave taight do the same, And never own a decent name!" With haughty air says Number One, As if the victory he had won.

But cannot help an after thrust To show the depth of his disgust! "On you the burglar plays his trick, For such as you he loves to pick !" "But worse than that," roars Number Two, The convict rakes and puzzles you!

He digs or climbs with stealthy mind And leaves you, bolted, far behind?" At this the first prepared to spring, Insulted by the odlous fling. The second bold and saucy still Advised the first to make his will, "For you," says he, "so grand and tall,

Must like Goliath stoop and fall, If you attack me! You began This mean assault upon a men!" At this this brazen key turned round And interposed his diction, sound, Like some brave officer whose sight,

Restrains two villains from a fight. Thus men for rank and preference wage A shameful contest full of rage. Thus norse or vent their petty spite Without regard for truth or right, Thus each imagines he is great And fit to bear the cares of State, Thus kings and beggars are akin.

And thus the undeserving win.
