or our beloved England It was at such a time, and such a night as this, somewhere between Beyrout and Malia, that the noble frigate Aster was cleaving her way through the dark waters-so quietly and smoothly that, but for the phosphore-cent fine of light which waleft in her wake, and the ripides of brilliant foam which she se aufully dashed, with a murmur of protest at their unwonted disturbance, from her shapely bow, could an observer have been near her, he might have thought he gazed on some beauteous vision of a ship, with all he beliying sails gloaning white in the moonlight against a dark background of sky, instead of a solid reality of oak and canvas, freighted with living men

Captain Richard Montague had left his orders for the night, and had turned ed in some hours is fore. The middle watch had been mustered, and were stretched about the decks, amongst ropes, and between the guns, taking such repose as the hard planks afforded their weary limbs, lulted to sleep by the atmost imperceptible morfor of the ship and the soft, cool breez which was just sufficient to fin the swelling sails. Lieutepoint Jones, the officer of the watch, was pacing up and down on the quarter deck, keep ting a watchful eye on the sails and the belinsman, his hands burned deep in the pockets of his loose easy fl ting monkey jacket, and whistiin softly to himself, "Home, sween Home," For myself, I was listlesly swinging my legs on the capstan, in a peaceful and contented frame of mind, drinking in the placed beauty of the star spangled -ky, and letting my thoughts felly roam away to not far off English home, in which di rection they were probably carried by

And so it was, and the sentry to formed us in due time, with the adultional information that I, the midshipman, was wanted in his cabin So down I went, wondering not title what he could possibly want Now, Captain Richard Montague who was in command of her Britan me Majesty's ship Aster, was not rotebety or fldgety man; nor had he any of those bullying propensities that alas! too many of our other wise inestimable captains notoriously evince. He was a kind, confreengentlements man firm and straight torward; very different from the old school of binstering swearing, rough and ready old sea-dogs that every reader of Marryatt's won ferini stories 222c is inclined to associate with the idea of navy captain " He was on whuniotained strict discipline in h ship, without the exercise of any undue severity On shore he was jovial and affable to all, a keen sports an and an enthusiastic promoter of ath letic sports, shooting matches, dra natic performances, and games for the amusement of his men-incition both officers and men to a wholesome rivalry in such diversions, at all of which he imself was an adept. He was a man habitually cool and cour geous in time of trouble and danger and won honors and distinctions for ersonal gallantry from a grateful muntry But when I went into his cabin on his particular occasion, he was not imself. Something appeared to have haken the equilibrium of his habitially steady intellect, and I knew hat it must be an affair of great im portance, for his band shook as he eckoned me to come closer, and he was looking pale and agitated in the extreme. He was in his dressing-gown, sit ing by a table on which a light waourning, and beside him was placed a glass of strong brandy and water. He seemed a pout to communicate something; but, after some hesitation, appeared to change his mind and sked abraptly if I went the rounds of the ship below regularly during my watch, according to his or-

Down I went into the lower depth-Here or nowhere must be concealedwhat? I do to't know but I thought that I must find something; but no. nothing rewarded my toil. I looked everywhere. I turned over everyhing, peered into the water tanks tried the store-room doors, crept into dusty recesses that, perhaps, no one had ever thought of trying to get in to before since the ship was built; but the only result was, as might have been expected, to send a score or two of rais seampering in alarm over the deck, and get myself covered all over with dust and whitewash Son last my search, and just as wise as when I
