word of Mr. Beecher, his own letters and acts prove beyond possibility of dispute that in these two statements he has deliberately tried to blacken Moulton's character in order to break the force of his expected testimony. And this, we must confess, seems to us altogether the most fatal feature in the case against Beecher. It would have been possible to believe, as we have twice suggested, that Mr. Moulton himself had misunderstood agondefinite confessions of criminality; but it is not possible to believe that Mr. Beecher has falsely accused subsequent date, unless because he decision will be heard with delight mony would prove his criminality. The charge against himself Mr. by the settlers, though the case will very conclusively, by showing that the money was contributed to support the Golden Age, without Til ton's knowledge, and by Mr. Beecher's desire. That is not all; the proof produced that Mr. Tilton absoutely refused to receive pecuniary aid for the tuition and support of the young girl who was sent West, because she had overheard acknowledgments of criminal intercourse, is in itself strong proof that Mr. Beecher was conscious of his guilt.

But by way of proof nothing more conclusive could be imagined than the explicit declaration of Mr. Moulton that both of the parties had repeatedly confessed their crime. When the scandal first broke out, we said that if Mr. Moulton produced the letters quoted, and testified that the parties had confessed guilt to him, no defense could be set up, unless his testimony could be successfully impeached. Mr. Beecher has attemptproved; first, by Mr. Beecher's acts and letters long subsequent to the payment of the money, and second. by Moulton's account of the object for and the manner in which it was used. His testimony must, therefore, be accepted, unless his veracity shall be hereafter successfully assailed, as conclusive proof.
