Refuge, excepting in rare instances, because the cost of passage makes it impossible for the large family to leave the country.

When we reached the old holding of Matt Walsh, the reapers were already at work—fifty or more—with sickles and scythes.

Several car-loads of ladies from Bella and Clare Morris came out to see and take part in the work of "holding the harvest."

The day was a little overcast, and it rained a little; it usually does rain a little every little while in Ireland.

The climate here, at least this summer, was absolutely perfect.

After the first field was cut the men with scythes formed in military order and headed a procession—some fifty of them—which was next formed of the sickle men, and the women and the children.

After the field was cut a meeting was called, which Father Corbett addressed, and of course no American can escape from an audience in the West of Ireland without being forced to talk to them.
