DOMESTIC confusion, even in the best regulated families, may be confidently exted when the parents go out and leave the elder child, or children, to take care of the younger. To quote the expression of an American humorist, the question arises, "Why is this thus?" Why does rebellion almost universally arise against the delegated authority of the eldest son or daugh-ter who is appointed for the time "head of the house." Is it entirely owing to the innate combativeness of the younger fry? or is it not rather quite as much the consequence of the disagreeable manner in which the older assert their reign? If the absent parents could only see the airs which their juvenile lieutenants put on, and hear the tone in which they command or prohibit, threaten or denounce, certainly the younger "rebels" would not be blamed unqualifiedly. They usually have some reason in their resistance. And next comes the question, where and how do children learn to "domineer" and lord it over those who are momently put in their charge? Where did they acquire the tone and the manner which would be ridiculous if they were not hateful? What copy do they follow and exagerate? Children are universally imitators. And it may reasonably be suspected that many of hem do not require to go from home to learn how to make the assertion of authority disagreeable. Children cannot be expected to understand the force of power when exerted with gentleness of manner. But their elders might having graduated from childhood and advanced to the relation of parents, to know enough of both conditions to comprehend the bearing of each. Yet it is wonderful how litof injustice done to children. Would it not be well for parents sometimes to children, they were, if not disobedient, at least ungracious? Firmness is indisis prudence in leaving some minor mattheir own, are weakened rather than to construct it again as before. strengthened by constant watching. They are so persistently led that they cannot walk alone, except by starting off in some erratic direction which is all the more enjoyable because it has not been recommended by authority. And if only it has a flavor of presumed disobedience the average human infant finds that flavor pleasant and piquant rather than otherwise. Whoever has authority to exert, whether that of a parent over children, a teacher over pupils, or an official over men, will meet deference and cheerful fensive manner! Cases sometimes arise when only rude force will answer. But these instances are exceptional; and the man or woman of quiet, calm demeanor will generally accomplish much more than the person of opposite character. Def erence to pleasantly-exerted authority requires no sacrifice of independence. Children who rebel against each other, in the case supposed above, are only rehearsing the parts they may perform when they enter upon the work of life in manhood. "Men," says the trite proverb, "are but children of a larger growth," and the school room and the nursery foreshadow the battles of life. Politeness, which costs nothing, is worth everything.
