Egyptian Funerals.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Cincinnati ind the Democrats as generally with the rall Gazette, writing from Egypt, says:

"At the cemetery in Cairo we saw a now a Committee on Cheap Transportation funeral procession, and followed it out who are giving the subject their most carefu of curiosity. Half a dozen men, some of them blind and each resting a hand on mechanical interests of the country, without the shoulder of another, led the way and oppressing or wronging railway corporations chanted a melancholy air. Then came a man with a small coffin, borne on his head, and behind him were a half-dozen women and as many boys, the women closely veiled, according to the custom of the country. The procession did not nove in couples, according to the Occiable whenever it can be determined what that dental custom; there was no observance of regularity, except that the men were ways.
