There is one safe way. Get a genuine production of one of the very best makers and you cannot go astray. Among these undoubtedly stands pre-eminent the Mason & Hamlin Organ Co., whose organs are so well known that other get my melons ripe before the fall frost, that they can make as good an organ as makers are generally content to claim and some years I only succeeded by cover ing them on frosty nights; but by saving and introduced the Cabinet or Parlor and introduced the Cabinet or Parlor fruits I have succeeded in having nice ripe musk-melons by the 15th of August and watermelons a few days later. For early vegetables I generally plant the seed in the watermelons a few days later. For early vegetables I generally plant the seed in the ground where they are to grow as early as the state of the soil will permit in the spring, and advance vegetation by placing around each hill four bricks set on edge and covering with an 8-by-10 pane of glass. In the first place, after well pulverizing the soil, the surface should be hoed or raised in small mounds, similar to potato hills, and the seed covered lightly on the apex, and the protection of bricks and glass placed around each hill.
