The church at Bex, in Switzerland, in which the Helvetic society held its meetings last year, presents, it it said, a curious acoustical phenomenon. The interior of the building is rectangular in shape, except that one of the short sides is replaced by a rounded part. The pulpit is nearly at the middle of one of the longer near the bottom of it (a little to the right) very badly. But any one situated two or ed part, on one side of the door, heard with remarkable distinctness the least words pronounced from the bottom of the pulpit. Reciprocally, words spoken in a very low voice from the rounded part were perfectly heard at the point occupied by persons addressing the audience, so that the latter were thus sometimes quite incommoded. It was a case of conjugated acoustic force. The effects in this church at Bex are said to be more remarkable than those in St. Paul's, London, or the Conservatoire des Arts et Mettiers, Paris, often eited in works on physice.
