Habits of Wild Animals at Night. A reporter of the New York Sun had an opportunity recently of visiting a menagerie at night, and he thus tells what he saw and what the animals did on being disturbed of their night's rest. He com-.11 25 mences by describing the monkeys, which "1 year and under 2 6 00 he says, were clustered together on the o floor in the corners of the cage. The attendant, who showed the reporter about in the dim light of a couple of gas burn-H ers, scratched the cage with his cane, and instantly a dozen whitish spots appeared on the surfaces of each of the clusters. 100 These were the faces of the monkeys. A A They were held perfectly still for a short time, but when another gas jet was lighted nearer the cage several monkeys broke e oo laway from their companions to leap from o oo perch to perch and squeat like bats. Dr. Starr, the attendant, said that the monkeys sometimes roosted like chickens on s oo their perches, but such a peculiarity was 20 00 not observed in any of the eages. Mr. McClean, a very trustworthy keeper, says. they often induige their propensity for 15 fun by pulling each other's tails and pinching each other at dead of night, when the whole cage will set up a chatter. Monkeys never snore, but there is always heard a sniffling sound, the premenitory symptom of consumption, of which they generally die on account of the coldness and changes of a northern climate. In separating into different clusters to sleep each species seeks to keep by itself as much as possible. Dr. Starr said the pelican usually squatted on the floor of his cage like a duck in its coop, but it was found roosting on the edge of a water tank in its cage. Its big weobed toes are furnished with long, sharp curving claws, and clutched the metal 50 covered edge with a firm hold. Its beak, nearly a foot in length, rested along its back. When a keeper's hand was thrust warity between the pars, the long beak, as it seemed, with a single motion, moved 56 viciously from its back and struck a bar 6 00 of the cage against which the band had NF rested.
