

THE HERALD.

The Entry. While gazing on the stately hall above...

THOMPSON'S LAST JOKE. Thompson was a happy man, but Mrs. Thompson was not...

Thompson looked under his eyelids at his wife. She was following every word with earnest face and grief...

"That is this thing true?" "That is this thing true?" "That is this thing true?"

"Well, Theodora?" said the small woman, giving a lump of sugar to her canary.

"Well, I got entangled, as one does in those kind of affairs," stammered Thompson...

"What strange fancies men have!" she said, quietly. "It never occurs to me to make such a fool of myself!"

"And he forthwith gave her an address in a low tone, with humble countenance..."

"And I believed you to be a gentleman," she simply said, and walked past him out of the room.

"Hillo!" shouted Tony, feebly, his hand to his head.

"Noble friend, you've saved me," he cried. "Noble friend, you've saved me," he cried.

"Theodora looked at her grimly. He saw in it a warning, and the spirit of mischief filled his mind with other quotations."

through his hair with a wild air, he read out, with stern emphasis:

"All, Theodora?" wailed poor Mrs. T. "Is this thing true?"

"My country," sobbed Mrs. T. "I am an ornament, as well as a useful member, of that great and glorious folk menagerie!"

"Theodora," she said, slowly, "tell me, if you please, all about this."

"I'll draw it strong," he decided, "and see if I don't come down."

conceded, then blessed her, and rushed out. Mrs. Thompson behaved like a trump, and left her reformation in his hands as she went from his office."
