THE LITTLE MAN.

As the little man sat down in his seat, he looked at the other passengers. He was a little man, with a large head and a small body. He was dressed in a simple suit and a high-crowned hat. He was sitting next to a woman who was looking at him with a curious expression.

"What is it, my dear?" she asked, looking at him.

"I don't know," he replied, looking back at her."You look a little queer," she said."I'm all right," he replied, looking down at himself."You are a little different from the other passengers," she said."I am a little different," he replied, looking at her.

AN EAST BLOW.

The first blow came at dawn. The wind was from the east, and it was a hard, driving wind. The trees were bent and the leaves were falling. The sea was rough and the waves were high. The little man looked out at the sea and sighed.

"This is not the way to travel," he said.

The little man looked at the sea and sighed. The wind was still blowing from the east, and the sea was still rough. He looked at the other passengers and they all looked back at him.

"What is it, my dear?" the woman asked.

"I don't know," he replied.
