THE RED CLOUD CHIEF

A. C. HOSMER, - - - Proprietor

FRIDAY, NOV. 24, 1884.

PANGS OF STAGINATION.

Horrible Sufferings Caused by a Lack of Food and Water.

"When I look back in my own mind experience and think of the year 23 in the Arctic region, I think the people of charity and forgiveness should be thrown over their action," said George W. Benson, an experienced explorer, who had been attached to the British seaborne expedition. Continuing he said: "I was captain of one of the boats of the expedition when they were attached to the main expedition. One evening when returning from a boat expedition we were caught in a terrific squall and our boat was capsized near a small island. My crew was obliged to reach the shore, but our boat drifted away in the darkness. We lay down in the bushes and slept that night, and when morning broke we realized that we were on a desolate island. We explored the island and found on it only underbrush and trees, nothing in the shape of food or water. We had only to hope that we would soon be rescued.
The gale continued with violence, and we spent another night in our boat hides.

"On the following morning we began to feel the pangs of hunger and thirst, and finding an old barrel on the beach we broke it up and used the scraps to dig for water, which we found so hard that we could not drink it. Then we set up a pole on a cliff, with a string of one of the men fastened to it as a signal of distress. Our sufferings from thirst were insupportable. We passed the third night and day on the island without any change, except in one instance. With a companion I started on a tour around the island, it being our
